When this nomination process started this Senator fully intended to support the nomination of Senator Tower. That is what the confirmation process is all about. In-depth investigation, reading of the various reports and the collecting of information from a whole series of sources. During that process I must tell my friend that I came to the conclusion that I could not support the Tower nomination. Not based on difference of philosophy. Not based on the difference that I do not think John Tower has a great deal of expertise. But, Mr. President, I have decided that I cannot support this nomination because of the personal qualifications of the nominee. I happen to think that is important.

With regard to the 70 Members of this body that know John Tower well, I think that is true. I think I did know John Tower reasonably well, although we did not socialize a great deal. I think it is rather interesting, Mr. President, though, when we hear Senator after Senator making the point that we worked with John Tower, we knew John Tower, and we never saw him in any kind of condition that would cause us concern; yet John Tower himself has now come forth and admitted that he had a serious bout with alcohol in the 1970's. Evidently, unknown to the Senators that served with him at the time, including those who are making statements in that regard on the floor during this debate. Just because we did not know or we did not see anything that would give us pause or concern does not necessarily mean that it did not happen.

I also agree, basically, with the remarks of my colleague from Missouri, about the weight of evidence. Yes, if you just totaled up, I think, in the record that we read, those who support John Tower and those who do not support John Tower; or to put it another way, those who had good things to say, positive to say about John Tower, and there are many and they are well-intentioned—if you measure that, just in total numbers, against those who had outright objection or concerns, the positives will outweigh the negatives. I do not think that type of scorekeeping helps a great deal.

In conclusion, let me say that the comment that I made yesterday on television was partially taken out of context, as it was presented here today, because I do believe that the Senator from Missouri has made an excellent point with regard to the fact that we should generally support nominees. When I said in essence that when I asked myself a question and said that I had to answer that, "if I were President of the United States I would not appoint John Tower," I want to emphasize that that was put strictly in the context of my objection to his personal qualifications, which I feel very strongly about.

I thank my friend and colleague for his usual courtesies and I return the floor to my colleague from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. So, Mr. President, we are left with the following strange situation. An admission that the allegations of alcohol abuse are contradicted by the personal experience, insofar as I know, of every Senator who has served with John Tower and an admission that the weight of the evidence in room S-407 on the question of alcohol abuse is that John Tower has not been observed by all of these people to have the problem.

My question, again, is: If that is the case, if it is contrary to our own experience and contrary to the weight of the evidence, what possible argument or reason could there be for us to vote against his nomination? Unless the standard is not one of equity in weighing the evidence; but the standard, instead, is to indulge every possible presumption against the nominee; that any statement in a record, no matter whether or not it is controverted, no matter whether or not it is controverted several times over, should the basis of voting against a Presidential nominee just because we prefer to have somebody without any cloud at all over him.

I think that that is the wrong standard. I think that that is a standard that radically alters the relationship between the President and the Senate. The fact that it is a standard that has not existed heretofore in the 101st Congress, while true, is less significant than it is contrary to the standard that we have had throughout 200 years of our history. We have never indulged, to my knowledge, that kind of presumption against a Presidential nominee.

Now we have a whole new ball game of saying that we weigh the evidence upstairs against the President's nominee. We have our thumb on the scale despite the fact, as admitted by the Senator from Nebraska, that the weight of the evidence up there on the question of alcohol, certainly, which is the one that I was focusing on, is in favor of the nominee.

I would like now to broaden the subject a little bit on something that is of great interest to me and has been of great interest to a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle, and that is the relationship between the Tower nomination, the subject before us, and the larger issue of the relationship between the President of the United States and the Congress in the conduct of foreign policy, a subject which has really been given the misnomer of a bipartisan foreign policy because it has more to do with the relationship between the Congress and the President than the relationship between the two parties. It has been a matter that has received a lot of attention from a lot of us and, I think, a general agreement by Members of the Senate and the administration on the need to try to pull together in forming a foreign policy for the United States.

Back in 1987, the issue was raised by Senator BOREN and me in an op-ed piece in the Washington Post. What triggered that op-ed piece was that we had voted some 20 times in 1987 on the question of aid to the Contras without any real resolution. We had voted several times on the status of the War Powers Act in the Persian Gulf, and we had a State Department authorization bill to which 86 different floor amendments were offered dealing with matters of foreign policy.

Some of us, and particularly Senator BOREN and I, felt that having gone through that experience that this was a crazy way to run foreign policy, and that the United States was not being a strong and predictable voice in world affairs when we were forever tinkering with foreign policy. Some people said, and I think we said in that particular op-ed piece, that there were 535 Secretaries of State; that each Member of Congress was operating as a Secretary of State.

So we wrote that op-ed piece, as I recall, in December 1987. We asked the general question at the end of it if anyone is interested in this, let us know. Well, then Secretary of State Shultz did let us know. He was very interested in trying to get some greater sense of coordination and purpose in foreign policy by not having the Congress run off and in constantly different directions from the President.

A number of Senators also expressed their concern. We formed a group of sets—Senator BOREN, Senator BRADLEY, Senator NUNN, Senator BOSCHWITZ, Senator KASSEBAUM, and I, and we had breakfast one day, I remember, at the State Department with Secretary Shultz about just this question of how to try to form a greater consensus on matters of foreign policy.

And then before the 1988 election, the six of us wrote a letter to Vice President Bush and Governor Dukakis. It was written on October 6, 1988. So it was written sometime before the election. We talked about the need for more consultation. Then we had in one paragraph what I think pretty well sums up the letter:

> It is our hope that in return for more real consultation by the executive branch, Congress would agree to accept less congressional intervention and micromanagement of foreign policy.

I bring that up at this time because when the President of the United States selects a Secretary of State, when he selects his National Security Adviser, and when he selects the Secretary of Defense, the President is picking the three key players of his team to manage America's relationship to the rest of the world. That is why we have a Defense Department. We do not have a Defense Department to protect against problems within the country. It has to do with America's projection of its strength and its role in the world.

The President, when he selects members of his Cabinet in these positions, is picking people to execute the President's policy. So the question is, What is the role of the Senate and what is the role of the President in the execution of foreign policy?

President Bush has gone out of his way to say to us that he wants a more bipartisan approach to foreign policy. President Bush has gone out of his way to say that he wants more cohesion, more consultation, more closeness in the relationship between Congress and the President in foreign policy matters. In fact, that was really the thrust of his inaugural address. The great applause line in the President's inaugural address was when he said the American people did not send us here to bicker, and then he turned around to the Congress and he said that he extended his hand to us.

Then in January, the President convened a meeting one morning in the Cabinet Room, and he invited various Members of the House and the Senate to talk about this need to work together in foreign policy. He said that he believed in more consultation, and he instructed the Secretary of State, Jim Baker, to get in touch with the leadership of the House and the Senate to try to work out a way of creating a system so that it was not just a matter of sort of a statement of goodwill, but a structuring of a concept of a greater amount of closeness in foreign policy.

But, Mr. President, as we pointed out in the letter that we wrote to the two Presidential candidates last October, there are basically two elements in creating a bipartisan foreign policy. One element is more consultation by the executive with Congress, and the other element is more forebearance by the Congress and the actual execution of foreign policy. Those are the two elements. That is why we said in this letter,

> It is our hope that in return for more real consultation by the executive branch, Congress would agree to accept less congressional intervention and micromanagement of foreign policy.

That was to be the deal. They consult; we forebear. That was the point that Senator BOREN and I made in two different op-ed pieces, once in late 1987 and once in January of this year. It was a two-way street, not a one-way street—consultation plus forebearance, and the issue before us, I submit, in the Tower nomination is the issue of forebearance—the degree to which the Senate will defer to the President of the United States in the execution of policy, in picking his team in matters relating to America's role in the world.

The heyday of a bipartisan foreign policy was in the years immediately after World War II. Those were the days when Harry Truman was President of the United States. Arthur Vandenberg served in the Senate, was chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and Senator BOREN, who has been such a leading figure in calling for a closer relationship between Congress and the President, described the bipartisan foreign policy in an article in the SAIS Review. I would like to read a short passage from that article. Senator BOREN said:

> The leadership offered by such postwar figures as the Republican Vandenberg and Democratic Speaker of the House Sam Rayburn during President Eisenhower's tenure are hallmarks of an era of bipartisanship and a successful stewardship of the United States through some of its most crucial foreign policy problems. One of the most significant debates concerned the massive aid packages granted to other democratic governments in the aftermath of World War II. Both Vandenberg and Rayburn were critical players in gaining support for the multibillion dollar Marshall Plan in a nation that traditionally wanted to be as separate as possible from the European powers. An overwhelming majority in Congress supported the Marshall Plan as well as the hotly contested $100 million aid package to Greece and Turkey which was a watershed event for the new, active U.S. role in the world. In a crucial moment of debate over proposed Greek-Turkish aid, Rayburn came to the House floor and delivered a speech that demonstrated his commitment to strong Presidential leadership in foreign affairs.

And then Senator BOREN quotes with approval the following statement on the floor of the House by then Speaker Sam Rayburn.

> I trust that in our consideration here and in the other body this thing called isolationism may not again crawl out of the shadows and defeat the hopes of men and again break the hearts of the world. This Nation has leaders asking for certain action, and whether we like that leadership or not, we have it. It is the voice of America and whether that leadership is followed or spurned will have a tremendous effect upon our position in the world.

Now, Mr. President, I want to just report for emphasis that the final two sentences of that quote from Sam Rayburn.

> This Nation has leaders asking for certain action, and whether we like that leadership or not, we have it. It is the voice of America, and whether that leadership is followed or spurned will have a tremendous effect upon our position in the world.

It does have a profound effect on America's position in the world. Whether we follow the leadership of the President of the United States, and especially whether we are willing to forebear in the execution of policy and deference to a President in choosing his own management team is right at the heart of whether forebearance is going to be present.

I would point out, Mr. President, the timing of this whole unfortunate episode. President Bush had made his first major trip abroad. He had gone to Canada for a day or two. He went to Tokyo for the funeral of Emperor Hirohito. He was there with representatives of 163 countries, probably the largest gathering of its kind in history, the first trip of the President. When he was there, while he was attending the funeral, word came that the Armed Services Committee of the Senate had voted against his nominee for Secretary of Defense. I do not say that the blame is solely on the Armed Services Committee because I am told that the White House never asked that the vote not take place while the President was in Japan. But the fact is that vote should never have been allowed to take place while the President was abroad. How many times have I noticed in the Senate our great interest in whether the President or the Secretary of State is about ready to make a trip somewhere and should we pass some resolution to shore up the President, to show them that we support him. And here, while the President, 5 weeks into office is on his first major trip abroad, with 163 leaders of the world, the Armed Services Committee says, "No, Mr. President, you can't even name the person you want to be Secretary of Defense."

Cooperation, which is what Senator BOREN and I and others have called for in foreign policy, is a two-way proposition, not a one-way proposition. Cooperation requires a quid pro quo. My fear is that the majority of the Senate rejects that quid pro quo, that the majority in the Senate is perfectly willing to consult with the President—yes, let the President have meetings with us, let the Secretary of State have meetings with us but that the other side of that agreement is something that we reject, and that is the concept that in consideration for that consultation, in consideration for those meetings the Senate exercises forebearance in the actual exercise of policy.

My hope is that in the rejection of John Tower, if he is rejected, and even if he is confirmed, the closeness of the vote and the party line nature of the vote will not constitute a retreat to where we were in 1987 when we conducted 86 votes on amendments that were offered on the floor to a State Department authorization bill, that this is not a statement by the Senate that we are back to the old days of meddling with the President.

Mr. President, the best way to indicate that we are not going back to those old ways would be to give John Tower a solid vote of approval, whether or not we would have nominated him had we been President. That is the best way to indicate we are not going back. And if we are not going to confirm John Tower, then I would submit that the majority in the Senate should tell us whether we really want to pursue the notion of a cooperative foreign policy or whether instead we want to go back to those days of 86 floor amendments to a State Department authorization bill.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri for the excellent set of remarks he made with regard to this nomination and the process pursuant to which this nomination is being considered.

I want to associate myself with his remarks.

Mr. President, I must confess that I have watched the high drama of this Chamber over the last few weeks with some surprise. I had thought that during my 12 years in the Senate I had seen it all, that there was nothing that could occur in this body that was beyond prediction. I thought that after the manipulated mugging of Judge Robert Bork, nothing else would leave me astonished. I was wrong. I certainly was unprepared for the sudden formation of the Senate bed and breath check. A Senate bed and breath check, Mr. President. What is happening? Have we all fallen asleep and awakened in the middle of a Mark Russell satire?

Apparently, some of my colleagues have been swept up in the heady business of public moralizing. So concerned are they with the ethical state of America that they have decided to rewrite our traditional standards of judgment and equity and enforce a new standard—a standard that says that anyone who has been but the subject of rumor or allegations of impropriety is unfit for public office. And, they have decided that those who are merely the subject of cowardly, secretive and untrue whispers of alcohol abuse should forever be barred from the doors of public service unless they publicly confess to their alleged sins, be they imagined or real.

But I would like to suggest to my colleagues that before we get too caught up with this feverish rush of righteousness, that we take a moment to appreciate just what we are doing not only to John Tower but to this remarkable institution. Because it is not an idle observation to note that if we proceed with this temporary fit of morality, the standards by which we pass judgment on others and the standards by which we are judged will never again be the same.

Now, we are told that the assault on Senator John Tower is not political. We are told that this confrontation is not about power in Washington or a struggle between the executive branch and the legislature. We are told that it is an affront even to consider that this debate might have something to do with the future relationship between a Republican President and a Democratic Congress. Instead, we are instructed that the real issue is whether Senator Tower's personal lifestyle and business dealings since leaving the Senate are compatible with the standards we expect of a Secretary of Defense.

I am willing, at this point, to take this assessment at face value. By doing so, however, we have a new and perhaps even more ominous set of questions before us; namely, just what is the standard we have created for Secretaries of Defense, what are the actual standards by which we will consider a person for this position, and finally, does Senator Tower meet these criteria?

According to the report by the Committee on Armed Services, the Secretary of Defense has four principal roles: policymaker, manager, military commander, and leader. He or she must be an acknowledged expert on the military establishment, a skilled and experienced tactician, conversant on all national security issues, and a capable and brilliant commander of our forces in the field.

The report, noting recent crises, also indicates that the Secretary of Defense must be on 24 hour alert, ready at a moment's notice to leap into the fray. The report goes on to say that the Secretary must also be a person of the highest standards of moral conduct and integrity. In other words, the report seems to say that the Secretary of Defense must be a combination of Solomon, Cincinnatus, and Horatio. And we probably ought to throw in Superman and Captain America as well.

Given that standard, it may not be a total surprise to hear that some on the committee found that Senator Tower did not qualify. Arguably, one might wonder just who in the United States could satisfy the committee majority's quest for perfection. I certainly would like to meet this Olympian of human perfection—but I assume that is a debate for another day.

In determining that Senator Tower is unfit to be Secretary of Defense, the majority of the committee acknowledged that he has had a long and distinguished public service career. They concede that he has a number of strong qualifications for the position. However, apparently, these issues were not the determinative factors. What they found troubling, however, were his standards of personal conduct, discretion, and judgment. In other words, the argument seems to be that Senator Tower is qualified for the job, but we just do not like his personal lifestyle and are worried that it might affect his performance at work. On that basis, the majority stands ready to destroy Senator Tower's reputation and career.

This brings us to the second question—what were the standards used by the committee when considering Senator Tower's nomination? For example, the committee majority concluded that Senator Tower has an undefined problem with alcohol. They state he has engaged in the excessive use of alcohol.

Having read the FBI report on this nomination, as well as the committee report, I was a little surprised to see that this particular condemnation was so unburdened by fact. In fact, it has been particularly interesting to see how many of the alcohol allegations already have been reported and repudiated in the press. There is no damning doctor's report. There is no real documented evidence, except what Senator Tower himself has said. Senator Tower has indicated that he has taken to drink in the past—that he did drink in the past. He has indicated that he now drinks very little, and that he is willing to abstain from alcohol during his tenure or service as Secretary of Defense.

This was not enough for the committee majority. It seems, Mr. President, that we are being asked to judge Senator Tower on the basis of rumors. We are expected to assume that since he allegedly—and I emphasize the word "allegedly"—abused alcohol in the past, he will continue to abuse alcohol in the future. So much for the notion of rehabilitation. Given my own personal lack of knowledge about the consequences of heavy drinking and the considerable expertise of some of my colleagues, I was tempted to take their word for it. But we, too, have a higher standard to follow. We, too, have a responsibility to pass judgment not on personal whim or prejudice but on actual knowledge—actual fact. We have an obligation to set a higher standard for accuracy than the one employed at the National Enquirer.

And the facts, as best as I can tell, are that Senator Tower does not have a drinking problem.

Let met paraphrase for a moment. Mr. President, his critics keep circulating stories about his drunken sprees, and the tales have persisted through the years. He may have had his troubles with the bottle earlier in his life, but he seems to have imbibed no more than that of most officers. He enjoyed his glass, and on rare occasions may have enjoyed one too many, but there is no documentary evidence that he was the chronic drunk his foes made him out to be.

Mr. President, is this preceeding statement I have just made about Senator Tower? No, I simply paraphrased a quotation about General Ulysses S. Grant from Stephen Oates' biography of Abraham Lincoln.

I fear that the critical difference between the two gentlemen in their respective situations is that Abraham Lincoln was willing to judge a man by his actions and not by the rumors of his critics.

One wonders what the committee majority would do if confronted with Winston Churchill, who took great pride in his alcoholic consumption and was prone to start each day with a scotch and soda. We can only assume that he, too, would fall victim to the committee majority's quest for moral perfection.

The committee majority was also appalled by the allegations that Senator Tower has been indiscreet with women. Yet, the report of the committee majority indicates that there is no substance to these rumors. But, then, in perhaps the most underhanded of swipes, they indicate that they have learned of a number of examples where they feel that Senator Tower was indiscreet. Again, there are no examples to substantiate this charge. There are no facts to substantiate this condemnation. There is no explanation of the moral standard the committee chose to impose. Instead, Senator Tower is leveled with generalities.

Mr. President, I find it fascinating to note the evolution of the standard by which we judge our fellow men and women. Jesus of Nazareth cautioned us to let him who is without sin cast the first stone. Next came the judicial cornerstone that a person is innocent until proven guilty.

Now, however, we seem to say, if it is a Presidential nominee, get him before we substantiate the facts.

Apparently, some of my colleagues are understandably uncomfortable with the moralizing that has tainted this particular nomination. Knowing their history, they may feel a little uncomfortable with our periodic fits of morality. So, instead, they point to Senator Tower's apparent conflict of interest as the reason behind their opposition.

Again, according to the committee majority, it has no evidence to show that Senator Tower has provided his clients with classified information. What was his sin, Mr. President? As best I can tell, first, it was because he put himself in a position which, while totally legal, could create an appearance of impropriety. Second, perish the thought, he made too much money. Senator Tower has no remaining financial interests in any firm or entity which does business with the Department of Defense. Consequently, there can be no conflict.

John Tower agreed to existing requirements by promising to recuse himself from any suspension or debarment issues which may involve a previous client. He has gone beyond the letter of the law and agreed to abide by its spirit.

For the committee majority, that is not enough. They have decided to impose a standard which exceeds existing law. To better understand this standard, let me put it in a slightly different context. What if a Senator served on the Finance Committee and retired to a practice of tax law? Would he or she be barred from service in any subsequent administration or from holding any appointed office dealing with tax matters? Is that really where we are heading? These, then, are the standards we are now expected to adopt.

First, in a town where people are paid thousands and thousands of dollars to gossip, if enough people pass on a rumor, it must be treated as the truth, regardless of whether it has actual authenticity.

Second, if a nominee is rumored to have a lifestyle of which others disapprove, that nominee can be rejected. Third, a former Senator cannot stand for appointed office if he or she is hired by a business that has interests before any committee on which the Senator once served.

What person in his or her right mind would want to subject himself or herself to that type of nightmare? It would be better, Mr. President, at least for the 70 of us who knew John Tower and who served with him, to judge him on the basis of personal knowledge. We worked with Senator Tower day and night. We know how he performs in times of ease and in moments of stress. We know the man.

This brings us to the third question. Should we confirm the nomination of John Tower? The answer is easy, in my way of thinking.

Actually, John Tower is a dedicated, proven public servant. He is a master of defense issues. The majority admits that. He knows the military and the military institutions. Whether he or I share similar lifestyles is immaterial. Whether he or I share similar attitudes toward alcohol really does not matter. The real issue is whether Senator Tower is capable of being Secretary of Defense. To that, I say, yes, and more so than many of his present and former peers.

Mr. President, moral crusades inevitably turn inward. If we decide to impose these new standards on John Tower, then eventually they will be, and they should be, imposed on us. We, too, will be judged on the basis of rumor, vague generalities, and gossip. We, too, will be tried on the basis of unsubstantiated allegations, uncorroborated whispers, and factless criticisms. One can only imagine how many of us will survive a similar trial by innuendo. Could anyone?

Mr. President, we should do unto John Tower what we would have done unto us. We know John too well to need to resort to anonymous rumors and allegations. He should be judged on his record. He should be judged on the basis of his career, and on that basis, John Tower should be the next Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BINGAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, I voted to disapprove the confirmation of John Tower as Secretary of Defense, and I stated that I will stand by that vote, if the issue comes to a vote here on the Senate floor.

It is a very difficult decision, one that I regret having to make. However, the deluge of questions and information that has been raised since the nomination was announced by the President on December 16 has greatly concerned me.

My examination of the reports and records which were compiled by the committee and the reports and records compiled by the executive branch and presented to the committee, persuade me that this country would be better served with a different individual in that key position.

Responsibilities and the demands of the Secretary of Defense are, in some ways, greater than those imposed on other members of the Cabinet, in two respects: First, the Secretary of Defense is in the chain of command, and orders to send this country's troops into combat are sometimes initiated by, and always arrived at with, the direct involvement of the Secretary of Defense.

Second, the men and women in our military are held to very demanding standards of personal conduct, and I believe that tradition is one of the great strengths of our Armed Forces. The Secretary of Defense needs to exemplify that same tradition.

One area of question and concern and information that has greatly concerned me is that which suggests the longstanding habit of excessive drinking. Those allegations and that information did not come from one or even from a few sources, Mr. President. It came from a great many unconnected sources, and the allegations and the information and questions are not limited to any particular time period. They span several decades.

The other area of great concern relates to the issue of the revolving door and conflict of interest. There, I think, the committee's report, the majority of the committee, in their report, I believe, summarized the problems or concerns very well. That report makes it clear that from mid-1986 until December of 1988, Senator Tower provided consulting services to a number of defense and aerospace firms, and in the 13 months immediately prior to his employment as a defense consultant, he served as the chief U.S. negotiator for the strategic arms reduction talks in Geneva.

The committee's conclusion was that the rapid shift from status as a negotiator to status as a consultant giving advice on the probable outcomes on ongoing negotiations created the appearance of using inside information for private gain.

The committee also concluded, "Senator Tower's decision to provide consulting services on arms control matters so soon after serving as an arms control negotiator crossed the line with regard to the revolving door which is of great concern to the committee." I am quoting from the committee report.

Mr. President, I would like to address also three procedural issues that I think have been discussed at length by others on the Senate floor but I think need some additional comment since they have been raised again today.

The first of those is the timing of the vote in committee. It is true that the vote did occur in committee when the President was away, was in Tokyo, attending the funeral of Emperor Hirohito.

The Senator from Missouri made the point that the White House did not in fact ask for a delay in the vote. I think the issue, in my understanding of that vote as it came up, was not that the White House failed to ask for a delay, but in fact there was an affirmative effort to move to a vote by the administration and the committee was complying with that request and went ahead and voted when it did.

The second procedural matter is the question of making materials available to the public. The decision on how to vote on this nomination is extremely difficult under the best of circumstances. Unfortunately, the difficulty is compounded by the fact that the information that has been presented to the Senate has been presented to the Senate primarily in a form which we are not permitted to reveal.

The correspondence between the counsel for the President, Mr. Gray, and the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, makes it very clear that it was the intention of the White House and the clear understanding of the White House when that material was provided that that material was not to be made public, that the contents of the FBI report was not to be made public. The letter from Mr. Gray to Chairman NUNN says very clearly:

> The documents we will provide are extremely sensitive. Their disclosure could jeopardize the privacy interest of Senator Tower and others, the confidentiality of FBI sources, FBI availability to conduct background investigations and our ability to recruit qualified candidates for positions of governmental service.

In order that those materials be provided to the committee for their consideration, both Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER, the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee, were required to sign essentially a contract with the counsel for the President where they agreed that access to those documents would be limited to Senators on the Senate Armed Services Committee and to six designated staff members.

So clearly there has been a major problem here in being able to adequately discuss this for the public's understanding, but that is a problem imposed by the materials and the conditions imposed on those materials by the White House.

That point has been made. I know it has been made very strongly by Senator NUNN, but I feel it needs to be repeated so that everyone can understand that the materials in question here are not the province of the Senate to reveal; they are materials that were protected by the executive at the request of the executive, and that is how they remain today.

The final procedural point I make is that we should go on and vote. In the contacts I have had with people in my State, some are in favor of Senator Tower's nomination; some are opposed to Senator Tower's nomination. But without exception, I have found nobody in my State who can understand why this matter is being delayed and why we have not gone to a vote before now.

I, myself, have great difficulty explaining to them why this matter is not called for a vote, and I understand that the majority leader has stated his intention to go ahead and bring this matter to a vote as soon as all Senators have completed their statements.

I am persuaded that no votes will be changed as a result of further debate. This is a subjective judgment. It is one that each Senator needs to make based on his or her reading of the records that have been presented and the conversations with Senator Tower, and I know many here have had those conversations.

But I feel very strongly, as Representative MO UDALL at the Democratic Convention, who made a point which I thought was very insightful. "After 2 or 3 days of speeches," he said, "everything has been said. It is just that everybody has not said it."

Here we have the same situation. These issues have been discussed and discussed and debated and counterdebated, and I believe very strongly it is time to vote.

I hope very much that my colleagues will conclude this discussion and that we can go to a vote at the conclusion of this debate in the very near future.

I regret that in spite of the numerous questions that have arisen and new information that has been presented since December 16 when this nomination was made by the President, the President has chosen to go forward and require the Senate to vote on this nomination. In my view those questions have not been adequately put to rest and the cumulative weight of the information provided to the Senate leads me to conclude that we should go forward and request the President to send another nominee to the Senate.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado, Senator WIRTH.

Mr. WIRTH. Thank you, Mr. President.

I know that the distinguished Senator from Arizona has been waiting. Very briefly, on behalf of the committee majority, I would like to clarify three quick points, and answer some of the allegations made a little bit earlier.

One was made on the timing of the vote, discussed briefly by the Senator from New Mexico.

The allegation was made that somehow the timing of the vote a week ago Thursday was meant to compromise the President, or perhaps, as was suggested, was a violation of some spirit of bipartisan cooperation that we ought to be pursuing.

This could not be further from the truth.

In the committee, the agreement was made on Wednesday, February 22, to go ahead with that vote. The minority had been particularly adamant about going ahead with the vote frustrated as they and we were by the delay that was requested on the 7th of February by the administration because another report had come up from the FBI. That report arrived at the committee on February 20. All the members of the committee had a chance to read that and all the committee members agreed on Wednesday, February 22, to go to a vote the following day.

We met again the following day, on Thursday, and had a long meeting throughout the afternoon. There was a caucus requested by the minority. They spent a good deal of time discussing what their strategy was. I do not know what went on there because I was not in that caucus. But there was at that point no request from the minority that we delay the vote. There was absolute agreement on both sides that there would be a vote on Thursday, the 23d, and it occurred on Thursday, the 23d.

So for anyone to suggest that somehow this was a partisan attempt to embarrass the President or that this was a violation of some kind of bipartisan spirit is simply not the case.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WIRTH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WARNER. The Senator is correct. I was the focal point of many of those discussions. There was never any occasion on the minority side or the majority side to have the vote delayed, and no communication as far as this Senator knows from anyone down at the White House. I do not know how this issue has arisen, but in my judgment it is a nonissue in terms of what transpired here in the Senate.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the distinguished ranking Republican member of the committee for his comments. I think we can set that issue aside and I hope that does not come up again.

Second, suggestions have been made about the truthfulness of the allegation concerning Senator Tower's consumption of alcohol. The suggestion was made that since Senators who have served here with Senator Tower had not stood up and said they had seen him overimbibing or having misjudged his capacity, or whatever, that this must not have occurred. References were also made to "Anyone who is the subject of rumor," as if all these allegations were rumor, and that "these are cowardly, secret and untrue allegations of alcohol abuse and undefined problem with alcohol, surprised to see this condemnation unburdened by fact."

Wait just a minute here. Let us just look at what Senator Tower himself has said. Senator Tower has said—and he said this on television Sunday—"I have admitted to excessive drinking in the 1970's."

So to suggest that there is no evidence, that all of this is rumor or cowardly in secret and so on is simply not the case.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WIRTH. Senator Tower has also suggested this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WIRTH. I will be happy to yield when I finish.

The remaining issue that we have to look at is not whether this existed but what the current behavior or interpretation of Senator Tower's behavior is. And it seems to me we should get that straight and on the record. We are not talking about rumor or cowardly and untrue allegations. The Senator himself, Senator Tower himself, says, "I have admitted to excessive drinking in the 1970's."

I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the Senator. I am sure that he is aware that there is a significant difference between heavy drinking or even excessive drinking and alcohol "abuse," which is what I intend to address when I have my time on the floor. It is one thing for someone to occasionally indulge in excessive drinking. Many, many people have. There is a great difference, however, between excessive drinking and the "abuse" of alcohol, which manifests itself in behavior patterns which impair one's ability to do one's work.

So let us not put anything to rest, I say to my friend from Colorado, that Senator Tower ever did anything because of excessive drinking came under the notice or attention of 70 Members of the Senate who served with him. Alcohol abuse, however, manifests itself in irrational behavior. None of that was exhibited by John Tower in his 24 years as a Member of the U.S. Senate. So let us not put these allegations to rest, because nothing that John Tower ever did ever impaired or impeded his ability to serve for 24 years as a U.S. Senator, 4 years as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, head of the Tower Commission and as an arms negotiator in Geneva.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the distinguished Senator. I look forward to the clear distinction made between excessive drinking and alcohol abuse. I am sure there is a distinction. I am not trying to make that distinction in my remarks. I am only trying to suggest that those who say there is no evidence at all of excessive drinking by Senator Tower simply have not read Senator Tower's own statement.

Third, the subject of womanizing has been brought up today, as well. I think it is important to again point out what the record says.

It is absolutely untrue that there was "dancing on the piano." That did come to the committee by some source. We sent it to the FBI for them to review. It was proved to be untrue. We never suggested there was anything in that. Where that all got out in the public, I do not know.

The Geneva involvement with an East-bloc woman, that also proved to be absolutely untrue. In fact, when the media was going to run with that story, they were warned off of that by the committee. The committee said to them, when they called up and said, "What about this?" we said "It is not true. Don't go with that story. There is nothing to it. Don't run it." And everybody ran it that night. It is very unfortunate, but that is the case. That is the kind of thing, I suppose, that perhaps sells soap or whatever on the evening news, but it certainly was not fair, not correct, not accurate, and certainly not fair to former Senator Tower.

But, on this subject, do not let it be said that there is nothing to substantiate any charges in terms of this sort of personal behavior. There are clearly in the record troubling examples specifically identified by specifically identified individuals as to Senator Tower's own behavior in this area.

Now, we all have to make a judgment as to how serious that is. My purpose here is not to pass that judgment, but rather to say that the committee clearly understands there were a number of allegations that were absolutely untrue, false, off the wall in every way. But the FBI record and the committee record also contained a variety of very specific examples.

I thank you very much, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Thank you, Mr. President. Let me follow up the remarks of the Senator from Colorado about the issue of Senator Tower's use of alcohol. The way this issue is being handled is very unpleasant and it really grows worrisome. The FBI report is filled with allegations, many of which have been in the media. The fact is that there is no substance to those allegations. Every time such an allegation has surfaced in the media and been tracked down, if it has not been made by some unnamed person who cannot be traced, we have found that it is false.

Anonymous accusations cannot be refuted, but they also have no credibility. I do not know how in the world you deprive someone of the ability to confront their accuser, which is a basic American right, or how you can even begin to provide them with that capability if you do not even know who the accuser is. And, as we all know who have read these FBI reports, there are many of them that are designated as T-2, or T-13 or T something else. There are so many that it is really a distasteful thing to read what is basically gossip and innuendo.

It should also be of some interest to my friend from Colorado, and to the Members of the Senate, that all the allegations that have been ventilated in the media, and can be traced to specific people and events, have all been found to be false. Is that not an interesting coincidence, that the stories about Geneva, once investigated, turned out to be false; that the stories about the sergeant in Texas turned out to be false; and that all the other such stories that have been printed in the media have all turned out to be false?

In the estimate of my friend from Colorado, however, there are new standards in determining guilt or innocence. The issue is no longer the accuracy of such charges. If there are a sufficient number of cartridges strewn around, then that is sufficient evidence to determine one's guilt. Further, the charges that are credible and believable are the ones in the report that somehow have not been made public.

As to making the report public, the White House faces exactly the same problem that the committee does. My friend from Virginia remembers very well a couple of discussions that were held in the committee about an attempt to sanitize the FBI report so that it could be made open to the American public. I proudly admit that I was one of the first that said that the kind of craziness in the report should be exposed to the American people. The people have to see the kind of accusations that are in this report and what is being done to this person. This request was considered by the chairman and ranking member of the committee, who finally said it is impossible to sanitize this report.

That is the same problem the White House faces today: We cannot seem to find a way to provide this report to the American people without implicating individuals who have made the allegations in it under the cloak of anonymity and with the guarantee of anonymity.

I hope we can sanitize the report. I hope we can bring it out, because there is no doubt in my mind that if the American people ever saw what was being done they would find these charges both bizarre and patently unfair.

Mr. President, I am not going to talk today for a long period of time. I see my friend from Alaska is here. In fact, I would be glad to yield to him for a few minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do have just some brief remarks. If the Senator would allow me to do that, I will be happy to keep them brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to my friend from Alaska without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Alaska has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do thank my friend. I made some comments last week. Several people made the same remark to me that my good friend and colleague from Vermont just made, and that is, why do I not smile a little bit while I am out here on the floor on this subject.

I am reminded that an old Alaskan friend of mine says, "Show me someone that smiles when everything appears to be wrong and I'll show you an idiot."

I am not an idiot, and things appear to be going wrong for my friend. That is why I am back out here again today, and I will be back out here again tomorrow trying to ask the Senate to come to its senses.

Along that line, Mr. President, I would like to have the privilege of offering a resolution. It is probably not totally in order in executive session, but I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to submit it and have it printed in the RECORD at a place in the RECORD where we are not in executive session.

Mr. WIRTH. Reserving the right to object. May we have a sense of what is in the resolution?

Mr. STEVENS. I will be happy to read it, as a matter of fact. It reads:

To provide procedural due process to individuals nominated by the President to be the principal officer of an Executive Department during consideration of such nominee by committees of the Senate.

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of rule XXXI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by—

(1) inserting "(a)" after "1."; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b) Any individual nominated by the President to be the principal officer of an Executive Department shall be entitled to the following procedural due process rights during the consideration of such nominee by a committee:

"(1) All witnesses before the committee shall be sworn and subject to cross examination by the nominee or counsel for the nominee.

"(2) The nominee may call before the committee and examine (through counsel if the nominee requests) any witness presenting evidence relevant to the nomination.

"(3) The committee may not consider or make part of the record any evidence based upon nonattributed hearsay or information received from any unidentified or unavailable witness.

"(4) Notwithstanding paragraph 5(b) of rule XXVI, all meetings of the committee shall be open unless matters to be discussed or testimony to be taken at a meeting will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. WIRTH. Further reserving the right to object, the Senator from Alaska is only submitting it at this point?

Mr. STEVENS. That is correct. It will be referred to the Rules Committee where I am the ranking member and I think we will get some consideration.

Mr. WIRTH. I wanted to make sure there is no immediate action going on. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I was delighted to wake up this morning and find that I am in agreement with a comment made in the Washington Post. That does give me pause for a smile because that is not often. And I do appreciate it when I can find myself in agreement with the Post, because I think it is a great newspaper, of the greatest capital in the world. It is nice to find this comment and I would ask the whole editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TOWER DEBATE

Just a few days into the Senate debate on the fitness of John Tower to be secretary of defense—never mind that it already seems like a few years—a couple of things have emerged and some that were already known need restating. Of those that need restating, the first is that Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn is an honorable and serious man who, in opposing the confirmation of former senator Tower, is acting out of conviction and deserves to be listened to with respect. He well understands the second of the truths that need restating—namely, that there is at least a heavy presumption that a president is entitled to the assistance of the Cabinet members of his choice, unless members of the Senate find truly disqualifying, as distinct from merely disagreeable or politically unsympathetic, behavior on the nominee's part.

Sen. Nunn believes that evidence of such disqualifying behavior has in fact been found, and most, perhaps all, of the Senate's Democrats seem prepared to support him in that finding. The trouble is that they have been unable to make that case except on the basis of 1) untested and unpublished allegations, which defenders of Mr. Tower who are privy to the same information challenge, and 2) an appraisal of Mr. Tower by standards that have not been invoked before. If the Senate is to reject Mr. Tower, it must do so on the basis of more solid information and more persuasive logic than it has presented to date. So far the case for rejection has not been made.

There are, of course, some procedural impediments to making it. Sen. Nunn has properly argued against the indiscriminate release of the kind of raw, unsworn and incompletely examined material that is the stuff of the FBI file in question. But where that leaves the rest of us is in the uncomfortable, in fact untenable, position of having to make our own assessment on the basis of which of the serious and generally trustworthy people on both sides of the argument to believe. They all go into fabled room 407 and either study or skim the charges of Mr. Tower's drinking and debauchery and then emerge to give us their assessments. But the public can elicit from them only the most rudimentary, is-it-bigger-than-a-breadbox understanding of the size and shape of the problem.

We have said before in this space that the possibility of a drink-impaired defense secretary is grounds for Senate rejection—no two ways about it, and we don't care what Abe Lincoln once said about General Grant or how many gallons of brandy Winston Churchill is reputed to have downed in a day. It does not shake us in that conviction either to note the absolutely awesome hypocrisy of many of the senators following Sam Nunn's lead, some who themselves have indulged the same appetites and habits that are at issue in the Tower nomination, and some who, while professing themselves unwilling to confirm a defense secretary with a history of heavy drinking, given his nuclear responsibilities, have worked arduously in the not-so-distant past for presidential candidates known to have this very disability.

So to us the alcohol charge is central. But an FBI file, no matter what its usual standing in preliminary White House choices of nominees, is not the right basis for making this decision, especially when straightforward and reliable members of the Senate disagree on its contents and implications. And this is all the more true when, by their own account, members of the Senate set such great store by the FBI file, invoking it as the source of their change of mind about Mr. Tower, whom they knew for years, approved for the arms negotiator job he not long ago held and apparently also for the defense secretary post until they came upon this material.

It is also true, as Mr. Tower's defenders argue, that many credible people in public life who have worked with Mr. Tower are willing to testify that they have not encountered the misconduct with which he is charged, while practically no one with a name is willing to come forward on the other side, despite the full, rich fare of anecdotes that is served up daily in this city by people who claim to know but who won't take public responsibility for the lore they privately share. We understand Mr. Nunn's explanation of why it was so difficult to try to work out a "sanitized" version of the FBI file and accept his account of steps taken to enable Mr. Tower more directly to confront the evidence against him on both "womanizing" and excessive drinking. But we do not think the possibilities have been exhausted for devising some technique by which those who have been making the charges are made also to take responsibility for them, to come out in the open with their evidence so that it can be inspected and weighed by the public and defended against by Mr. Tower. You don't have to love Mr. Tower to believe that truly important values are at stake here.

One of these values is fairness, and here we come to the other large question, that of Mr. Tower's conduct in selling his insight and information to private defense contractors so immediately upon leaving his job as arms control negotiator in Geneva. We think it was rotten, undignified behavior. We also think it was just about par for the course in these matters. The hypocrisy on this question in fact rises to tidal-wave levels. Comparable things are done all across the board all the time in government, including by those who have just lost or given up a seat in Congress. Mr. Tower has not been accused of compromising classified information. If he had been shown to have done this, the answer would be easy. But rather he is charged with behavior that Congress has condoned in its own and on the part of nominees to the executive branch that it likes. Is there a new rule? Is it fixed? How should it affect other nominees now in line for confirmation in administration jobs? Will it be supported when some who are liked on the Hill but who have similary history come before the Senate?

Sam Nunn has expressly publicly his own discomfort with some of the limitations of the confirmation process in this case. He must also be aware of the dangers inherent in it—the awful precedents established by such total reliance on the kind of material found in FBI files and even appearing to adjust the criteria for confirmation of presidential appointees in an arbitrary or political fashion. This is not his style and it is not the style of many of those serious folks in the Senate who are opposing John Tower. They owe it not just to Mr. Tower but to their own reputation to find a way to make the proceedings fairer, the standards clearer and the case—if they can—more credible.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the comment.

If the Senate is to reject Mr. Tower it must do so—

And the word "must" was in italic—

it must do so on the basis of more solid information and more persuasive logic than it has been presented to date.

So far, the case for rejection has not been made.

Mr. President, I am wont to write little notes to myself. I am reminded that, in recent years Senator Nick Brady became the Secretary of Treasury; Senator Edmund Muskie became Secretary of State; Senator Richard Schweiker became Secretary of Health and Human Services; Senator William Saxbe became the Attorney General. There may be others but I just thought of those. And I thought of those times and I particularly remembered the nomination of Senator Muskie. So I called upon our very capable computer, which spewed out some facts about my good friend and former neighbor. He is a good friend. He was an excellent Secretary of State and I do not want anyone to misunderstand what I am saying.

I am just saying to the Senate we ought to think about the scenario and realize that, if the Senate does what I think it may do, this could never take place.

Senator Muskie was asked to replace Cyrus Vance, as he left the Secretary of State position in the Carter administration. That quickly drew the praise of Members of the Senate and I have the AP story of April 29, 1980. The then leader and my good friend, ROBERT BYRD of West Virginia, called Muskie a "rock of reason." He was "the right man for the right job at the right time."

The Republican leader at the time, our leader, said, "I think it is a great appointment and the President is to be congratulated," said Senate Republican leader Howard Baker.

But one of our colleagues, Senator ROTH, suggested that the Senate insist on using this confirmation process as a forum for a top-to-bottom review of American foreign policy because "the position is more important than the person."

We found it necessary to change the law so that Senator Muskie could be nominated for this job and within a matter of days, President Carter had signed into law a bill that cuts the salary of the Secretary of State, cut it, clearing the way for Senator Muskie to be formally nominated to the job. We all recall that was the case, to reduce the salary to its 1977 level because Senator Muskie voted on a pay raise.

Then there were predictions on May 7 that Senator Muskie would face close examination on foreign policy issues, admissions that he has little foreign policy experience. And, in a Reuters article, one of a whole series of 65 stories on that day concerning Senator Muskie, was this statement:

He has been one of the least active members of the Foreign Relations Committee. His Senate reputation was linked mainly to environmental issues and his work as chairman of the Budget Committee.

As a Senator, I was pleased to support Senator Muskie. He was called before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on May 7. After 3 hours of hearings the committee recommended his confirmaiton by a vote of 12 to 1. And the same afternoon, the Senate voted his confirmation by a vote of 94 to 2.

I have no doubt that if John Tower had been nominated by President Reagan last fall while we were in session, following the resignation of a Secretary of Defense, a similar proposition would have taken place. A similar thing would have happened.

I do not know what has happened to the Senate since these days, a day of true bipartisanship. Members on both sides of the aisle witnessed to the fact that they knew Ed Muskie, without regard to whether he had foreign policy experience or not. He is a good man, he had served in the Senate well, and he made a good Secretary of State. We were right.

The precedent that is about to be set here is a precedent that will live with the Republic. It is a precedent that I think ought to be examined deeply before we establish it. And, Mr. President, I intend to be here on the floor again and again to make sure the Senate does examine it. I am not going to filibuster, and I am ready to vote whenever anyone says it is time to vote. But until that time I want the Senate to think.

For instance, John Tower was selected to be an arms control negotiator on January 18, 1985. He was nominated on February 25, 1985. He was confirmed by the Senate on February 28, 1985; 3 days later. This President knew that. This President knew that his colleagues, working with him in Geneva, overwhelmingly supported his efforts there. This President had 13 leading citizens of Washington, including at least 6 Senators on the majority side, tell the FBI, before he agreed to nominate John Tower, that John Tower was eminently qualified to serve as Secretary of Defense.

I hear statements out here on the floor that John Tower has had an alcohol problem. I have heard the phrase "alcohol abuse." As one that has worked in the area of alcohol and drug abuse because of some terrible statistics in my own State, I want to say to the Senate: Those are words of art. They connote someone who needs treatment. They connote someone who, his friends would tell him, "you have a problem."

Mr. President, there is nothing in this record at all to conclude that abuse exists. No friend of John Tower ever told him he had an alcohol problem. There is no record here that any medical person ever told him he had suffered from drug or alcohol abuse.

As a matter of fact, the FBI report is directly to the contrary. When inquired of, his doctor said, there is absolutely no evidence of any drug or alcohol abuse, as far as this man is concerned. Those of us who have been his friends for years have come forward as character witnesses to state to the Senate he has no alcohol problem. He has said himself that he drank a lot at times, but John Tower has never said he has had an alcohol problem.

I hope that some of us would start being specific if we are going to say John Tower has an alcohol problem. Where does that come from? I read the FBI report. That is not in the FBI report. That is not fair to my friend to tell the American public that John Tower has an alcohol problem.

As a matter of fact, as I told the Senate last week, he could not have an alcohol problem. He has lost a considerable portion of his colon and anyone is going to tell you he is not going to drink again very much in his life and live long. He is smart enough to know that.

I am indebted to my friend. I am not going to take forever.

One of the other things that came to my mind over the weekend was this. John Tower's record in Geneva as an arms negotiator for our country is outstanding. The other Ambassadors who were there with him attest to that fact.

I am looking for the letter written by Max Kampelman that appeared in one of the local papers. If I find it, I will ask it be printed in the RECORD tomorrow. I know it was a fact because I was there. I sat in John Tower's office one night fairly late and had a glass of wine with Ambassador Karpov. He has now been elevated in the Soviet Union and runs the arms control agency. The people who negotiated for the Soviet Union, Ambassadors Mastakoff, Habakoff, Karpov, were extraordinary people, and we had a group of extraordinary people at Geneva. The two countries succeeded in coming together with an historic agreement that we have ratified. It is the INF agreement, we all know.

My last point to the Senate is this: What is the reaction going to be in the Soviet Union. Here for the first time is the nominee to be Secretary of Defense who was a Member of our Senate for many years. He is known to be capable in the field of defense, went to Geneva at the request of the last President and led a groups seeking to reduce strategic weapons, to reduce the number in the inventory of both of the superpowers. He had been unanimously confirmed by the Senate and sent to Geneva. He returned victoriously with his colleagues with a good agreement.

And now this President has selected him to be the Secretary of Defense in a period of time that we are trying to tell the world we are willing to try and maintain our defense at least cost; we are willing to reduce strategic weapons; we want to have negotiations on reducing conventional weapons. And here is the one man who has had experience in the Senate and as a negotiator. Now, we are saying, that on the basis of events that took place before the time when he was confirmed unanimously by the Senate in 1985, he is disqualified from serving the United States as Secretary of Defense.

If people want to talk about fairness, let us talk about fairness in terms of when these charges came up. I was in the committee. I went upstairs Monday morning, 2 weeks ago, to read the FBI report. That same day in came an allegation. I think it was from Arizona. It told me this person was a man who had no ax to grind, none at all, and he had a statement concerning activities of Senator Tower that just had to be examined, had to be checked.

At great cost to the taxpayer, we checked and found they were false. They were false. Every time we are just about ready to consider John Tower, another group of rumors come in, and, as the Senator from Arizona says, every one of them has been false since that first time that the members of the committee say they are almost ready to vote and confirm him.

The question has to be asked, What has happened to the procedure of the U.S. Senate? Does anyone on the majority side think an Ed Muskie is going to be confirmed in 3 hours after being reported out of a committee with 3 hours' hearing by a majority of the same party that has the Presidency again? If John Tower is not confirmed, do you really think that? Do you think that we are not setting a precedent?

This will be the first time that we have done this except in the case of squabbles following the war between the States, which I think cannot be viewed as a precedent at all. I beg your pardon, the recent unpleasantness between the sovereign States. I stand corrected with the occupant of the chair and my colleagues standing both within striking distance.

Mr. President, the precedents of the Senate led this President to believe that his good friend, who he knows is qualified, could be confirmed by the Senate. He is President of the United States. He has the right, in my opinion, to the assistance of people who he trusts. We have the duty and obligation to give our advice and consent, and if we find that his nominee is not qualified for that office, we should turn him down.

Mr. President, I have seen no evidence in all of the evidence presented to this Senate that anybody could assert disqualifies this man to be Secretary of Defense. On the contrary, I state again that if you wanted to find a person to send word to the Soviets that we are sincere about arms control, even to the point of putting in charge of our total defense establishment a man who negotiated with them for 2 years to reduce strategic weapons, that is a significant message to send to the Soviets.

John Tower, arms control negotiator, in the strategic area is going to run the Department of Defense. It is almost a scenario that you would pray for, and yet John Tower's friends have to come before you and pray that some of you will come to your senses.

I looked up also—I am not going to belabor it—the number of committees that John Tower had served on, the number of people who are here now who served with him, and I had a whole series of thoughts about what would happen if any of my friends on that side of the aisle were nominated by a Democratic President and some of my people on my side of the aisle would challenge them. I cannot think of the number of times I have traveled either to my State or to NATO or into the Far East or through the Iron Curtain countries with many Senators on that side of the aisle. I have gotten to know many of my Democratic colleagues to the point of being a character witness—having witnessed them and how they handled foreign people, how they dealt with staff, how they conducted themselves in difficult circumstances. Mr. President, my sadness as a Member of the Senate right now is that the people here who do not know John Tower are unwilling to accept as a character witness those of us who do know him. And even those who do know him on that side are unwilling to put aside partisanship, put aside impressions made on the basis of rumors or unsubstantiated statements of unidentified informants in the FBI report and listen to those of us who know John Tower.

I will speak again tomorrow on this, Mr. President. But, in my judgment, there can be no other answer than that John Tower is qualified, and if he does not become Secretary of Defense, it will be to the great sadness of this Senate in the long run.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona still has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield once more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I now have the Kampelman letter. I ask unanimous consent it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 1, 1989]

THE TOWER FIGHT: MAX KAMPELMAN REPLIES

A brief innocuous paragraph at the end of a story [Feb. 23], an abbreviated and distorted leak, and suddenly two fine ladies, hard-working government secretaries, have a cloud hanging over their head. John Tower's two secretaries, to the best of my knowledge, have served our country well. I know of no reason to question that judgment or their character.

Furthermore, without intending to influence or intrude on the prerogatives of the Senate, I will add that I have never seen John Tower intoxicated, out of control or behave in an ungentlemanly manner. We worked closely together in Geneva for 14 months, during which he was at all times a professional in the best sense of that word and a negotiator of skill and sensitivity.

During the past four years of the Nuclear and Space Arms Talks in Geneva, more than 100 Americans have served their country, under my direction, with zeal, dedication, competence and patriotism. The American people, Congress and the press should not permit rumors and innuendo to distort the extraordinarily fine service performed by these men and women. I am proud of them, and so should we all be proud of them.

MAX M. KAMPELMAN.

WASHINGTON.

(The writer has served as chief of the U.S. delegation to the Nuclear and Space Arms Talks in Geneva.)

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, my friend from Alabama has been very patient. I understand he has a relatively short statement to make.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield to him without yielding my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the floor is yielded for the purpose of the statement of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my distinguished friend from Arizona for yielding time. We all have time problems, and my statement is short.

Mr. President, I wish I had been able to enjoy the privilege of reading the FBI reports at one or two sittings, but other duties have required that my review of these reports occur over a number of days. Today I finished that task. I also have spent considerable time talking with and listening to members of the Armed Services Committee, reading and rereading the committee report, reading commentaries, and listening to the debates on the confirmation of former Senator John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I do not believe I have heard anyone question his qualifications for the position of Secretary of Defense. Universally, it has been proclaimed that he is qualified from the standpoint of experience, knowledge, and intelligence to be an outstanding head of our Defense Department.

This is not like a judicial appointment. Judicial nominees are with us for life and serve in a coequal branch of Government. Cabinet members are usually with us during the term of the President or for a period of time which the President determines, and serve in his branch of Government. We hold the President accountable for the conduct of the members of his Cabinet. It is the President's Cabinet, not Congress' Cabinet.

However, the position of Secretary of Defense is different from other Cabinet positions because the security of this Nation rests on his shoulders more so than any other Cabinet member.

In reviewing all of the charges, I have concluded that his conduct in many areas is not applaudable and not without justifiable criticisms, but, on the other hand, not disqualifying. Because of the sensitivity of the position as Chief Deputy Commander in Chief of the Armed Services of the United States, I do have concerns about whether such a position should be entrusted to a person who has a drinking problem.

I have served in the U.S. Senate with John Tower for 6 years. If he had a drinking problem during the period of 1979–84, I did not know it. I never saw him under the influence of alcoholic beverages; and, frankly, do not remember ever hearing any gossip that he had such a problem. Service in the U.S. Senate is extremely stressful. Long hours, sometimes all night sessions, periods of elation and periods of depression—moments of victory and moments of defeat. Such stressful life is conducive to drinking, and overindulgence. While he, like all of us, has faults, I never heard that John Tower had a drinking problem or never saw anything to give me concern during the time I served with him in the Senate. I might say in passing that my observation convinces me that the vast majority—and I mean almost unanimously—of the Members of the Senate do not have a drinking problem.

I have reviewed the FBI reports very carefully. Such reports are not conclusive as to whether he had a drinking problem in the 1980's that impaired his judgment on issues in his official governmental capacities. Reasonable people can read the reports and come to different views as to the correctness of the charges. Even if convinced that he exhibited a drinking problem on occasions, reasonable persons can differ on the effect that it might have had on his duties or the potential that it might have on his responsibilities as Secretary of Defense.

He has made a pledge that he will not drink any alcoholic beverage of any kind during his tenure as Secretary of Defense, if confirmed. He said that if he breaks that pledge he will immediately resign. Should the Senate accept such a pledge? Some say his past conduct is such that his pledge should not be accepted. But on the other hand, he says his pledge is tantamount to his oath to defend and support the Constitution of the United States.

I believe the issue comes down to two questions. First, if he were to break his pledge, are there safeguards which would protect the United States of America against abuses that could occur relative to the security of this Nation? And, second, should the Senate rely on his pledge?

The primary safeguard against abuse or the breaking of his pledge is the President himself. I don't believe President George Bush would allow a person to serve as Secretary of Defense whose conduct was a danger to national security. Further, I do not believe that President Bush would allow John Tower to continue to serve as his Chief Deputy Commander in Chief of the Armed Services of the United States if he broke his pledge. What individuals stand to lose the most if John Tower breaks the pledge? Obviously, it is the President and John Tower.

I do not believe a President, whether he be a Democrat or Republican or whether he be Lyndon Johnson, Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan, or George Bush, would have allowed or will allow a Secretary of Defense to serve or to continue to serve in that capacity if he had or has a drinking problem or broke or breaks such a pledge to the American people.

There are other safeguards. John Tower, if confirmed, will live in a glass bowl. No one will be more closely watched in the future. He will be watched by everyone. Congressional oversight hearings will serve as watchdogs. But the most persistent watchdog will be America's media.

Because of my personal observations, his background, qualifications and intelligence, the uncertain state of the evidence, his pledge and the safegards, I am willing to rely on his pledge and give him a chance to prove himself. Giving one a chance to prove himself or herself is one of the great redeeming values of the American way of life.

I will vote for confirmation.

I have no greater respect for any one in the U.S. Senate than the distinguished Senator from Georgia, SAM NUNN. His nonpartisan approach to our national security, in my judgment, is one of the primary and major reasons America is strong today, one of the major reasons that the tensions between the United States and Russia have eased considerably, and one of the major reasons that we have been successful in negotiating reasonable, verifiable, and fair arms reduction agreements. He approached this nomination with an open mind and continued his nonpartisan approach throughout, and I compliment Senator JOHN WARNER for cooperating with him and likewise taking a nonpartisan approach and carrying out that nonpartisan approach throughout the entire nomination process.

I rely on Senator NUNN's leadership relative to our armed services. I agree with him that the position of Secretary of Defense is an extremely sensitive one, and one that requires sobriety 24 hours a day. I only part company with him in evaluating the individual, in evaluating his pledge, and in evaluating certain safeguards. It could be that my observations and his may have been different but nevertheless Senator SAM NUNN is to be greatly commended along with Senator JOHN WARNER and others for the way that they have fairly and judiciously conducted the confirmation hearings and, have conducted themselves during and throughout this entire debate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona retains the floor.

The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Thank you, Mr. President.

In behalf of many people who favor the confirmation of Senator Tower, I extend our deep appreciation to the Senator from Alabama for what is obviously a very courageous move in announcing his intention to support the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I think it is appropriate, Mr. President, that we discuss in some detail an allegation made in a statement made at the time of the vote last Thursday night during the debate on the confirmation by the Senate Armed Services Committee of John Tower's nomination to be Secretary of Defense. That was an allegation, Mr. President, that Senator Tower was not qualified to serve in the military in a position of responsibility, whether as commander of a SAC wing or a nuclear submarine, wing commander, or various other sensitive positions of command, because of his lack of reliability due to alcohol abuse.

First of all, Mr. President, I think it is important to understand that the Department of Defense directive concerning the Personnel Reliability Program. For those who are not familiar with the military, I would like to provide some background. The Personnel Reliability Program was a program instituted to make sure that men and women in the armed services have the prerequisite standards of conduct in order to serve in positions of responsibility, whether that be in handling of a nuclear weapon on the flight deck of an aircraft carrier or at an air base, or any other such position of command.

This program was instituted a number of years ago, and I think it is a good program. It is one that has allowed us to compile a very outstanding record in selecting the men and women that we have put in positions of responsibility. The Department of Defense directive I refer to is the one which is adhered to when selecting people to these positions, and sets forth certain criteria which are part and parcel of the Personnel Reliability Program.

As was pointed out by the distinguished chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Nebraska, and my friend the Senator from Ohio, Senator GLENN, the first item mentioned for disqualification under this program is that of alcohol abuse. I think that is logical, I think we would not want anyone in positions of responsibility who abused alcohol.

I want to point out to my friend from Colorado, however, that John Tower has never said that he abused alcohol. I also hope that the chairman of the Armed Services Committee would not again construe Senator Tower's remarks about heavy drinking and interpret them as an admission that John Tower ever abused alcohol, because he did not. There is no record of such abuse. It is unfair to the candidate, the nominee, to accuse him of such abuse, and it's particularly unfair to say that he has made such an admission.

The important thing here, Mr. President, is to understand what the military uses as their criteria to define alcohol abuse. Everybody may have their own definition clearly of alcohol abuse. Some, according to my friend from Colorado, find mere charges to be enough. Others may accept unproved statements which are relatively vague in nature.

Clearly the military cannot operate using such unfair standards. The military has to have a viable definition and it describes alcohol abuse as follows:

> Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships.

Mr. President, I want to repeat this point. The definition of alcohol abuse used by the military—and remember, three members of the Senate Armed Services Committee said that John Tower was guilty of such abuse—is:

> Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships.

Mr. President, there is no record of any action or activity, or of anything that John Tower has ever done which fits into this description of alcohol abuse.

Mr. President, has John Tower ever been guilty of any misconduct? Not that I know of. There is no misconduct that has been brought before the public record. There has been vague discussion as to what is in the FBI file, as we all know. Unacceptable social behavior? If John Tower had indulged in some unacceptable social behavior, I think it would have been brought to the attention of the American people and the media. Has his work performance been impaired? Not when people like the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee said—and this is a quote from a statement by Senator NUNN, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee at the time John Tower left the Senate:

He will leave his own legend. John Tower is recognized as one of the most knowledgeable, articulate and effective leaders for a strong national defense that has ever served in the U.S. Senate. John Tower has never lost site of the fact that our men and women in uniform are our most important national security asset. During the Vietnam War John Tower made nine trips to Southeast Asia to visit the troops and review conditions firsthand, more than any other Senator. All of us can attest to his skill, his leadership, and his success in guiding a strong defense program. Senator Tower's success on national security issues can in part be attributed to his remarkable understanding of foreign policy. Not only does he know the issues—he also knows well the foreign officials who know them. This combination has been a tremendous asset to the work of this committee and the Senate as a whole.

Mr. President, that statement was made by Senator SAM NUNN. If John Tower had been irresponsibly using an alcoholic beverage that caused misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impaired his work performance, physical or mental health, or financial responsibility, or personal relationships, could the chairman of the committee, SAM NUNN, have made a comment like that? I do not believe so, or we would have to question, very frankly, the credibility of the person who would make such a statement about Senator Tower.

Mr. President, the reliability standards that are used in determining people for positions of responsibility, whether they be in the use of nuclear weapons or command of submarines, are:

Qualifying physical competence, mental alertness, and technical proficiency, commensurate with job or duty requirements, evidence of dependability in accepting responsibilities, and effectively performing in an approved manner, flexibility in adjusting to changes in working environment, evidence of good social adjustment and emotional stability, and ability to exercise sound judgment in emergency situations, positive attitude toward nuclear weapons duty, including the personal reliability program.

Mr. President, it appears to me that for 24 years, as a U.S. Senator, John Tower met all those criteria. In fact, his physical competence, mental alertness, technical proficiency as has been attested to in a statement by the current chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"Dependability in accepting responsibilities and effectively performing in an approved manner, flexibility in adjusting to changes in working environment." Mr. President, John Tower showed his flexibility when he was asked to head the Tower Commission and investigate the terrible trauma that afflicted this Nation called Iran-Contra. He showed his flexibility and capability when he served 2 years as a U.S. arms negotiator in Geneva.

Mr. President, what is it that since 1984 has brought not the distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Service Committee and also many other Members to change their perception as to whether John Tower is indeed qualified to serve in command of one of these organizations. Senator BINGAMAN, my friend from the neighboring State of New Mexico, said in 1984 that John Tower was an excellent chairman to initiate a freshman. "John Tower exhibited those qualities of toughness and fairness, tenacity and conciliation, determination and resolve, that have made my hours at the committee table lessons in management."

Mr. President, how in the world does this jibe with his present criticism? Does this praise, in any way, coincide with the present charges that somehow a man was abusing alcohol? How could John Tower have carried out his duties in the fashion which was so widely praised such a short time ago, and failed to meet the criteria for command in ways that escaped their attention?

My colleague from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, also praised John Tower. He has stated that "he has maintained a loyal, hard-working, responsible demeanor throughout his terms. John Tower's knowledge and understanding of military preparedness is unsurpassed. John Tower is an American patriot."

In contrast, Mr. President, on page 11 of the report of the Senate Armed Services Committee, considering the Honorable John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense, the majority goes on to say, with regard to the selection for an assignment to command positions, senior military commanders indicated there is no tolerance for alcohol abuse. Mr. President, I would like to hear from the majority what military commanders were consulted? Under what circumstances were they given access to the FBI file? What set of facts were they operating on when they gave that opinion to the majority of the Senate Armed Services Committee? I hope we will have an answer to that before we cast a vote on this issue, since I think you will find that if you ask most senior military officials, both active and retired, they are incredulous and outraged at the allegations against John Tower. They worked with John Tower for years and years.

I recommend to my friend from Colorado, that there are many, many retired senior Air Force officers living in Colorado Springs and other areas, that he could consult. They are people who knew John Tower in their service in the military. I think he will get an answer that may surprise him, if he has not talked to them, because of the high esteem and regard in which Senator Tower is held by senior military officers, and by those who actually held positions of great command and responsibility. He should learn how they feel this process has affected a man who they admire and respect.

Mr. President, I will be talking at length about this issue of fitness for command before we take a vote. I think it is of the utmost importance that we establish a clear record of what is being done to a good and decent man by this incredible process of allegations, and indeed, what is being done in the way of standards to be set for future nominees and to the traditional relationship between the executive and legislative branches.

In summary, Mr. President, I should like to say that the allegation that John Tower, because of alcohol abuse, is unqualified to serve as a SAC wing commander, as a commander of a Trident submarine, or other conditions of responsibility are patently and absolutely false according to the definition used by the military for alcohol abuse. In no way is there a scintilla of evidence that indicates that John Tower is guilty of alcohol abuse, according to the criteria set up by the military in their personnel reliability program. He may be guilty of alcohol abuse in the eyes of certain individual Senators, and they are entitled to that opinion, and to make their judgments on that opinion in voting on his nomination. But to say that, according to military standards, John Tower is not qualified to command, is absolutely and patently false, and I hope that this will clear up the record. I hope never again on the floor of the Senate will we hear false allegations concerning the qualifications of John Tower or anyone else, using a statement or the two words, "alcohol abuse" when they apply to the standards set by the military, as a criterion for service as Secretary of Defense or any other position.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REID). The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I came to the U.S. Senate 10 years ago, plus a few months or so, and one of my classmates was the distinguished Senator from Alabama, Senator HEFLIN. Those of us who have had the opportunity to be with him throughout this decade and those who have joined in that period of time cannot help to stand in awe of this giant of a man. He is, indeed, a free spirit, an independent thinker, loyal to his party—and we recognize that—and a great supporter of the institution of the Presidency.

If you enjoy a joke now and then, I guarantee that those of us who share a little behind-the-scenes visitation with the former chief justice of the Alabama Supreme Court will remember the stories always. He also served in the Marine Corps in World War II with great distinction, decorated, a company commander, and he saw a good deal of action in the Pacific. He never talks about it. He is a man of enormous humility. I cannot help but think that his remarks will stand out as a jewel amidst this debate, not just because he is going to cast his vote for John Tower, but also, as we listened, his thoughts were carefully reasoned, predicated on a bedrock of tradition and precedent. Therefore, I think the whole Senate salutes him for his contribution to this debate.

I certainly know I do, and I thank him for his remarks on behalf of the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Mr. NUNN, who incidentally is trapped midst foul weather, and myself as the ranking member. We both appreciate his insightfulness and thoughtful comments with respect to the matter in which we labor to produce this record for the Senate in a bipartisan way.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the leadership have indicated that the Senate should consider closing the day now because of the weather and the need for persons who have to travel a long distance to get home safely to their families and loved ones.

So I yield to my distinguished colleague here from Colorado to take the initiative.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

We are at this moment awaiting the majority leader to come to the floor.

I thank the distinguished Senator for his very kind remarks about the whole debate and the temper with which he has done this. As issues of fact have come up, the Senator from Virginia has been more than willing to jump in and say "Wait a minute, that is not the way it was. This is the way it happened."

I think that that kind of forthcoming factual record and his personal intervention has been very, very good for us all.

We have all, as you all know, the potential here of ending up on some very dangerous shores and maybe foundering on some heavy rocks over the next few days.

I think that the approach taken by the distinguished Senator from Virginia has been extraordinarily helpful on the floor as it was during the committee, and I just wanted to say that in this moment of commendation. I agree with him about the record of Senator HEFLIN, but I just wanted to add my own comments about the way that the Senator from Virginia has handled this which has certainly generated support from me and many others on our side.

We thank the Senator very much.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Colorado. We enjoy a strong and warm friendship, and we serve together on the Armed Services Committee which committee has to pick up the work the day after this debate is over and go right forward as we have in the past. Once again I think we will garner the reputation as the most nonpartisan committee in the U.S. Senate. I hope that will be the case because that is in the best interest of our foreign policy and our national security policy, and, we, the members of that committee, work hard to achieve that.

I thank my friend.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I see our colleague from the State of Washington is here. We are awaiting the arrival of the majority leader.

Mr. WIRTH. If I have the floor, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, this Senator has just had the pleasure of watching and listening to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, Mr. HEFLIN. As befits someone who is a part of high drama, the Senator from Alabama left us somewhat uncertain of his conclusion through most of the remarks which he made before he shared with us his decision to vote in favor of this nomination.

Those remarks, of course, are an important part of this debate.

They are perhaps the most important single set of remarks since the debate on this nomination began.

I wanted to take this opportunity to express both my admiration and my thanks to that distinguished Senator for the courage, the thoughtfulness, and the wisdom of his comments on this nomination.

When I addressed myself to the Tower nomination last Thursday, I pleaded with my colleagues on the majority side to consider as carefully as they possibly could the consequences for the President, for Mr. Tower himself, and for this institution, of a strictly partisan vote to reject for the first time in the history of the Republic a nomination to a Cabinet position by a President who is just taking office.

I spoke, as have a number of other Members here on the floor, of the flawed nature of some of the process and of the evidence on which a number of Members were making their decision.

Since the opening of that debate, a number of commentators on matters political in the United States, some conservative, some moderate, and some liberal, have joined in questioning the grounds upon which this nomination might possibly be rejected. Many of those comments have centered on the justice or more precisely the injustice of making judgments of this importance, first on the basis of unsubstantiated and uncross-examined testimony by persons, many of whom are anonymous and few, if any, of whom could have their allegations checked out, as well as the twin disqualifications brought up by others, which amount to after-the-fact judgments on the conduct of the nominee after he ceased his Government service, even though none of that conduct has been asserted by any Member or anyone else to the best of my knowledge to have violated any law, or regulation, or rule of the Senate.

To have the distinguished Senator from Alabama join in those remarks, to have his judgment of what he found in the FBI report to confirm what a number of us have said but from the other side of the aisle is particularly important in the course of this debate. It is important partly, of course, because the Senator from Alabama is reluctant and rightly reluctant to dispute the judgment, even when it is narrowly focused, with respect to this nominee, with the very distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services. It is perhaps even more important because of the background of the Senator from Alabama, as a justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama, perhaps as the former chief justice of that court, though I do not remember his biography well enough to be certain of that characterization. This simply indicates to a greater extent than is true with many of us. He comes from a long career of attempting to deal justly with individuals as well as with ideas.

His remarks on the separation of powers and the fact that a President of the United States in choosing a member of his Cabinet, even so important a member of his Cabinet, is making a choice which is quite different from that which he makes when he picks a Justice of, let us say, the Supreme Court of the United States, a position which is held for life, which go to the center of this debate.

As he did his remarks not only on the background of the nominee, but on the consequences of the nominee's failure to live up to his pledges, the Senator from Alabama is correct, of course, in saying that the failure on the part of Mr. Tower to live up to those pledges would reflect discreditably not only on him but on the President who nominated him.

The risk, therefore, in confirming Senator Tower lies disproportionately on the President, on the administration, and on Mr. Tower himself. That is a risk which the President is not only willing to take, but it is one which he welcomes. He has stuck consistently with his nomination throughout the course of this debate. He has not backed away from it in any respect whatsoever.

This nomination is one of the three most important to the President with repect to our foreign policy and to our national security.

It is, therefore, particularly important that we have the support of an individual so respected by his judicious nature, for his careful evaluation of the evidence, and for his respect for constitutional principles.

I fervently hope, Mr. President, that he will soon be joined by other members on the majority side of the aisle. I hope that we may be able to conclude this debate during the course of this week and that the President's Cabinet can go forward so that decisions with respect to the national security can go forward and no longer stand in limbo.

Mr. President, I continue to believe that this is not only an acceptable nomination, an acceptable candidate, but a particularly outstanding one, a man whose background in this body and working on behalf of the last President has been distinguished and thoughtful and has given him a peculiar command over the issues with which the Department of Defense will be faced in the course of the next several years.

I believe that even his background, short as it is, in the private sector, will have given him an insight in the defense contracting community which will serve him, the Department of Defense and the United States in good stead; that going into that position with the knowledge that the nominee has within it and with the strength of character he has shown in the past is more likely to give us a Department of Defense which can deal with the new and peculiar problems of the budget for defense, that this nominee can carry out those difficulties perhaps better than anyone else who might be substituted for him.

For that reason, Mr. President, I once again wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama and all others who have been willing to support this nominee even when some of the press particularly, and some public opinion has seemed to be against him.

This debate at least is beginning to take on the lineaments of a debate in the finest tradition of the Senate. I hope that it is able to end this week with the confirmation of this nominee.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, this afternoon I heard one of the most respected and admired Members of the U.S. Senate, Senator HOWELL HEFLIN, of Alabama, in his very eloquent and very persuasive statement regarding the nomination of John Tower to become the Secretary of Defense.

I would like say, Mr. President, that there is no man in the Senate that I admire more than HOWELL HEFLIN. We came to this body exactly one decade ago together. He is someone whose judgment I know is held in great esteem in this body by colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

But, Mr. President, if I might, in all due respect to my colleague from Alabama, draw to the attention of our colleagues that the issues that, as we call him, "The Judge"—that Judge HEFLIN, Senator HEFLIN discussed were basically issues in one subject area. And that subject area which Senator HEFLIN so eloquently addressed involved the issues of personal life alleged to have been associated with the present nominee for the Department of Defense Secretary, Senator John Tower.

Let me say, Mr. President—and I can concur with Judge HEFLIN on this—after 6 years of serving with John Tower, I have never seen him out of control. In fact, Mr. President, I have never known him to be, in my personal dealings with John Tower as a Senator and as a private citizen, anything but a gentleman. I think he has this country's interests at heart. I believe John Tower has many, many qualifications that might qualify him to be the Secretary of Defense.

But my argument this afternoon, Mr. President, does not deal with the personal life of John Tower. In fact, I am one of those few Senators who has not gone to the fourth floor of this Capitol. I have not reviewed the FBI files. I have not inquired of my colleagues or anyone else in my realm of association as to the personal life, rumors or innuendos or stories about John Tower. Even though there are some in this body who find that issue, that of his personal life, to be the most relevant of concerns, Mr. President, to me that is not the most relevant of concerns when we consider this nomination for the Secretary of the Department of Defense.

I believe, too, as Judge HEFLIN believes, that were he to be confirmed as Secretary of Defense, Senator Tower would keep and honor the particular pledge that he took Sunday 1 week ago.

But, Mr. President, I would like to address another issue for a few moments—an issue that has been discussed for days in this Chamber. The issues that I think needs a little further illumination is whether or not the President should have his man.

Mr. President, this is not an easy question. When we have questions that are not easy and, more importantly, questions that are troublesome in this body, generally we go back to the foundation of what this system is all about. That foundation, of course, is written in the Constitution by the framers.

If we go to article II, Mr. President, section 3 of that great document, we see very clearly that the Senate and the Senators are involved not only in the nomination process but also in the advise and consent process. And in my reading of article II, section 3, there is not even the slightest hint, Mr. President, that we have to find a reason, be it good or be it bad, to support or to oppose a nominee from the executive.

In fact, the Founding Fathers who wrote this particular article and section evidently anticipated a day, much like today, when we would be faced with making difficult choices regarding such a very, very important issue. Mr. President, I would humbly submit that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in this Constitution that requires us to use any particular value judgment system in coming to a conclusion. Our people of the 50 States elected us, gave to us that unique and awesome responsibility to make tough decisions in the advise and consent process. Those Founding Fathers certainly anticipated that from time to time, from generation to generation, we would find it necessary to come to a conclusion on our own, whether it be based on information relative to a personal life, or conflict of interest, or whatever it might be. They saw that ultimately our conclusions would belong to us and to us alone.

I go back just a few years, Mr. President, and remember when former President Reagan named James Watt to become our Secretary of the Interior. If my memory serves me correctly, it was 8 years ago, I think, Mr. President, that I wanted to oppose James Watt but I could not find the reason why I should oppose him. So I voted for him.

Frankly, I think that was a bad vote on my part.

A little while later, Mr. President, then President Reagan sent us the name of Edwin Meese to become the Attorney General. I could not find a specific reason to oppose Edwin Meese, but, for some reason, I did not think he was the man for the job at the time and I voted in opposition to his nomination. People back in my home State said: Wait a minute; Why did you not vote for Ed Meese, the President's choice to be his Attorney General? And I replied that it was simply because of an instinct. And maybe, Mr. President, instinct, our own human instinct that our people sent us here to exercise, is enough; it is enough to properly exercise in this awesome challenge in the advise and consent process.

Oh, yes, Mr. President, how many times during these last weeks; how many occasions on this floor and especially in the national media, on the talk shows, have we heard certain of our colleagues get up and tell us that we owe to the President the right to have his own man? Let me, if I might, quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 9, 1977. This is from the debate regarding whether Paul

Warnke would become our chief SALT negotiator. I quote:

The suggestion has been made that the people should trust the President to make the right appointment. I think that ordinarily we do around here. But after all, the Constitution has vested in us the responsibility for advise and consent, and it is one that we should exercise.

The quote goes further, Mr. President:

There is too much at stake here to impute dishonest motives or irrational motives to one side or the other in this debate.

Mr. President, do you know who made that statement? His name was John Tower. He was a seated colleague of ours, in 1977, on March 9, during that nominating process for Mr. Warnke. And that, today, is the same man that is arguing that the President should get his man.

Yes, we have heard other discussions on the talk shows and in the media, and in this Chamber. We have heard discussions from other Members of this body who say that this is a political situation. Mr. President, let me quote, once again. March 4, 1977:

The nominations have been given the close scrutiny which is justified by their significance in determining the defense capabilities of this Nation.

Continuing the quote:

At this time, the Senate confronts its responsibility either to confirm or deny these nominations based on our judgment of Mr. Warnke's personal qualifications to fill these positions. It is neither a simple nor an insignificant responsibility.

Does the Chair know who made that statement on March 4, 1977? It was my good friend and our good friend, the very distinguished Republican leader from Kansas, Senator ROBERT DOLE, speaking relative to the nomination process.

On March 8, 1977, Mr. President, let me recite another quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Under the advise and consent powers provided in the Constitution, the Senate has a well-defined responsibility to approve or disapprove the nominations of the President.

Continuation of quote:

In those instances, the Senate has an equal responsibility to oppose such nominations. And the history of the Senate is replete with just such examples, where a President has been denied his choice under the advise and consent powers provided in the Constitution.

That statement, Mr. President, was given by a much beloved Member of this body. He is my friend, a distinguished colleague, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Senator STROM THURMOND.

On that final rollcall vote on Mr. Warnke, Mr. President, we saw that that nomination was opposed by our then-colleague Senator John Tower. It was also opposed by the distinguished Republican leader and my friend Senator DOLE.

Mr. President, all I am attempting to do is make the air a little purer around here and talk about some of the things that we should talk about, hopefully to end this debate and to vote up or down on John Tower.

It is time to do it. We have a huge Federal debt hanging over our heads, a savings and loan crisis that is going unattended, and yet day after day, night after night we stand here and dissect every little minuscule bit of this man's life. No one is winning. The President is not winning. John Tower is not winning. John Tower's family is not winning. The Senate is not winning. The Democrats are not winning. The Republicans are not winning. And, at the same time, the Department of Defense, which is the largest business in the world today, does not have a leader.

If we continue this debate in the fashion that it has been conducted during the past several weeks, this body should apologize to the American people. We should be ashamed of ourselves, ashamed that we are not ready to take this nomination and have the clerk start to call the roll so that we can get on with the business of America.

I have a very simple test, Mr. President, as I have said. I have not gone to S. 407 in the Capitol to read the reports on John Tower's personal life, nor do I plan to. My test for this nomination is very simple: Is this man going to be someone in the Department of Defense who is going to create problems or solve problems? Mr. President, I fear that he will create more than he solves. I say that with all due respect to this man who is our friend and was our colleague.

This has been a flawed and troublesome nomination from the beginning. We in politics, those of us in public service and, in public life, sometimes may not have a lot of sense. Sometimes we may do things that do not add up. But there is one thing—one piece of good sense—that we do have. We have a pretty good nose for when there is trouble out there. We can smell it. We can feel it, even though we sometimes cannot describe it or pinpoint it. And from the very beginning of Senator Tower's nomination, that has been the case and it has been trouble.

Let me go back a few months. Since he was elected I have supported every nomination that President Bush has sent to this floor. I hope to support every other nominee that he sends to this floor. But I would note that our President delayed announcing John Tower's nomination for a long period of time after he was elected. This body, probably including Members on both sides of the aisle, began to wonder whether, to discuss, and to sense that something was wrong. We thought maybe the President had read something that was not favorable. Maybe the President knew something that we did not know.

For whatever reason, there was a very long and extended period of delay and more delay. I felt sorry for John Tower during that time, Mr. President. I sympathized with him because he was twisting in the wind. He probably knew no more at that time about his future than he knows today. My point is that this has been a flawed nomination.

I think of those contractors that Senator Tower represented in the last few years. Had I been one of those contractors and had I been able to afford to hire John Tower, I probably would have chosen to hire John Tower. He had just left Geneva. He had just left the negotiations, and who else better to advise these huge companies on what to do to prepare themselves for weapons procurements in the coming years. So they hired him.

Is there anyone in this body, Mr. President, who believes that if John Tower becomes our Secretary of Defense, and if any or all of those contractors receives a DOD contract, that the second paragraph written about the contract is going to be about a potential conflict of interest?

Mr. President, these are fine companies and on the other side, or wearing the other shoe, if these same companies that had employed John Tower do not get the contracts from the Department of Defense, they are going to come in and perhaps justifiably allege that the reason they were denied a contract was that they had retained John Tower as a consultant.

So you have a no-win situation. The situation is damned if he does and damned if he does not, and that is not a very pleasant or efficient way to do business.

In conclusion, Mr. President, this is not a very happy time for the Senate. It is not a time of celebration. It is not a time during which any of us, I say, should be slapping ourselves on the back. This is one of those times that is very hard; very difficult; and frankly not much fun.

Mr. President, the issue is not John Tower. The issue is not George Bush. The issue is not what is good for the Republicans or what is good for the Democrats. The issue, Mr. President, is very clear. The real issue is what is best for the national security interest of this Nation. I will not support the nomination of John Tower, and I say that with great regret.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, several years ago before I knew or heard of DAVID PRYOR, I served at that time as Governor of Nebraska and along came DAVID PRYOR, the new Governor of Arkansas. Since that time, we have been very close friends, and of all of my colleagues in the U.S. Senate, there is none that I am fonder of or have more respect for their integrity, their thought processes and the overall balance that they have expressed both as a Governor and here in the U.S. Senate.

I believe the talk I just listened to is very typical of the man, the Governor and the U.S. Senator who I referred to. I congratulate DAVID PRYOR for a well-thought-out speech that was delivered and will provoke a lot of thought.

I know like many of us, this has been quite an ordeal for him. All should understand that it has been an ordeal for all of us. I thank him for his explanation and excellent remarks. I yield the floor.

Mr. MCCAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I would like to respond to a couple of comments made by my friend from Arkansas. He has asked for an immediate vote. I would tell him that, given the fire storm of allegations, the disparagement, the excoriation of a good man, and the destruction of a reputation he had for 24 years in this body, that he deserves to be defended.

Those on this side of the aisle, I say to my friend, we will defend him until we feel that there is a correct record of response to the scurrilous, unfounded allegations that have been made against him. I would hope in his sense of fairness he would agree that those of us who are his defenders would have ample time to do so.

As far as the delayed nomination is concerned, I think it is clear that in retrospect it would have been far better for the nomination to have been sent to the Senate as rapidly as possible. I also believe that it is important to remember if any nomination were ever again sent to this body without a thorough and complete background investigation, if some information came to light after that nomination was confirmed by the Senate, the responsibility justifiably would rest on the administration, and they would be guilty almost of dereliction of duty.

Obviously, with a man who has served in public life for as many years as John Tower had who admittedly was a man of some controversy, there were bound to be allegations and information that needed to be obtained. It was indeed unfortunate that there was a delay in submission of John Tower's nomination, but I am not sure that there was any other way that this procedure could have been carried out.

I agree with my friend from Arkansas that the issue here is the national security of the United States. The responsibility for the national security of the United States, however, rests with the President of the United States. I am sure that my friend from Arkansas, like me, like 98 others in this body, had the opportunity to seek the Presidency if we had chosen to want to make that gargantuan effort in order to do so.

But, it was George Bush that made that effort. George Bush ran for the Presidency, was elected President of the United States, and he is constitutionally in charge of security of this country with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, as far as his nominees are concerned.

The fact is that for the first time in history, we are now exacting new standards for the nominee for Secretary of Defense. We are not making up these standards for all nominees as my friend from Nebraska says. He says that if John Tower were a nominee for Secretary of Interior, we would not be asking these same questions. I say why not? It is important to be Secretary of Interior or Secretary of Commerce or any other job, and all of them, I believe, deserve scrutiny and examination.

The issue is whether we should set new standards for our approval of a nominee for any Cabinet post, the likes of which we have never used at any time in our 200-year history.

In 1968, when Richard Nixon came to the Presidency of the United States, all of his nominees were approved by the Senate in a matter of hours. Now, I think, things are changing rather dramatically. I think will be important after this is over for all of us to examine with great care whether this is good for the process of Cabinet selection, or whether it is bad for the process we should examine whether we are helping national security, as my friend from Arkansas so aptly pointed out, or whether we are endangering national security by watching a process being dragged out for weeks and months, when so many critical issues affecting the security of this country are being held in abeyance while we go through this unhappy ordeal.

I hope, I say to my friend from Arkansas, that we on this side can in the next couple of days clearly defend the record of John Tower and make our case and make our decision and move forward.

Then if John Tower's nomination is ratified by the Senate, we will have to find out how damaged is he and how difficult will it be for him to carry out his responsibilities. If John Tower's nomination is turned back, we must ask whether we should then go through a 6-, 8-, 10-, 12-week long process while we throughly investigate the background of the new nominee or should give whoever the next nominee will be a very short period of time for investigation and approval of his nomination because of the compelling reasons of national security. I am not sure that we are fair to the people of this country and to the process if we use speed as a reason to use a different process in dealing with the next nominee in case this nominee is turned down by the Senate.

I have great respect and affection for my friend from Arkansas. I think he raises some very valid points. I respect his opinion and views of this issue as I do on most issues. But at the same time I hope that we will be able to keep on with this debate—and I hope we will be able to keep debate on this issue at the level and the tone which has been articulated by the Senator from Arkansas.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues in commending the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. Those of us who have watched DAVID PRYOR know that something is going to happen when he comes to the floor and he kind of moves around, watching what is happening. You watch that look on his face and you know that he has been thinking in a Pryoresque fashion—he begins to vector in on the point he wants to make and stands up and starts, in his quiet way, to explode some great myth that has been perpetrated on the floor and does a wonderful job in bringing us all back to Earth. It is terrific and we thank the Senator very much.

We had one great myth exploded, and that is that somehow we do not have a right to suggest to the President that his choice may be the wrong one. It seems to me that effectively another way of putting this, as Senator PRYOR pointed out to those making this specious argument, is you cannot have it both ways. You cannot come in here in 1989 and say to all of us you have to let the President have his way; you have to let him go; it is injurious to the executive branch; it is a constitutional challenge; it is not a Senate prerogative to suggest that maybe the President made a mistake; you cannot let them do that. I will admit it was a long time ago and we have not had a President in some time, but let us go back to 1977 when we were in a similar situation and Paul Warnke was nominated to be the head of the arms control operation and some of the very same people who are saying we do not have the right to make any kind of a judgment were making precisely that same judgment 12 years ago.

You cannot have it both ways. We thank the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for coming in and making that argument and in his characteristic fashion exploding that myth.

I hope that we do get on with a vote, Mr. President. I was delighted to hear the suggestion that we might have this done in 2 more days. I can hardly wait for this to be finished, and if 2 days is adequate, great. I would like to have it done tonight or tomorrow morning. But at least we are through one more day of this agony. We had one very distinguished Democratic Senator come out for Senator Tower. We had another very distinguished Democratic Senator tell us he could not vote for Senator Tower. We have had a good wash of a day and we ought to retreat, go home, and maybe we can come back and finish this tomorrow.

The papers are replete with stories of paralysis in Washington, and part of that paralysis certainly appears to be downtown at the State Department without a lot of people being nominated; at the Interior Department we only have a Secretary, no Under Secretary, or anybody else; at the Department of Energy because of the length of the Tower FBI clearance, we did not get the very distinguished Secretary, Admiral Watkins, confirmed until last week and he has not had a chance to bring in his people. The Defense Department is on hold or adrift or whatever. Enough is enough. If we can get this done in 2 more days, terrific. I think people are tired of this. I am tired of it. All of us are tired of it. Let us get on with it.

I am very pleased, Mr. President, that the suggestion was made to be done in a couple days, and I think that is first rate. The last 6 weeks has been replete with problems. We have Tower, and before that we had the absolute delight of doing the pay raise. That was another wonderful thing. We have been delinquent in our duties, so let us move ahead.

In any case, Mr. President, I wanted to add my words of comment and thanks to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas who in his characteristic fashion has been very helpful, very thoughtful, and, I hope we can all agree to move on quite rapidly, get this done, let us finish it this week so we can get on with the Nation's business. I thank the Chair very much. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). Does a Senator desire to be recognized?

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the nomination of John G. Tower for Secretary of Defense has caused a great deal of consternation in this body.

Clearly, the responsibility this nomination presents to Senators to evaluate John Tower for this assignment is not one we welcome.

Yet it is our duty—an important duty—as Senators to vote for or against the nominations to key posts in our Government. And in the case of the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense the decision for me is not a close call.

I believe the nominee clearly is unfit for this crucial post for several reasons.

The principal reason I shall vote against the Tower nomination is because I believe it would be extremely imprudent to place in the National Command Authority an individual who has a demonstrated record of alcohol abuse. The Secretary of Defense is the No. 2 person in the National Command Authority, second only to the President in his ability to move troops, to order offensive military actions, to launch nuclear weapons. In the nuclear age, our Nation cannot afford to place in this chain of command an individual who is prone to alcohol abuse, who might be unable to make a thoughtful, prompt decision in a time of crisis. As Senator NUNN, Senator GLENN, and others have noted, John Tower's record of alcohol abuse—a longstanding pattern continuing in recent years without any clear interruption—would disqualify him from any position of authority in the uniformed military services. He would not be allowed to command a division, a bomber squadron, or a missile force. I believe it is eminently clear that the nominee should be disqualified from a top position in the National Command Authority for the very same reasons. This, it seems to me, is not a close call; it is the obligation of the U.S. Senate to prevent the elevation of such an individual to such a responsibility.

An additional reason I shall oppose the Tower nomination is that I believe the nominee has displayed a pattern of extraordinarily poor judgment in his attitude toward the handling of sensitive information and his approach to conflict of interest, revolving door questions. The Pentagon sorely needs a leader to restore public confidence in the integrity of the defense procurement process. It needs a leader to preside over the difficult decisions we are facing in setting defense spending priorities. But in John Tower we have a nominee who has displayed no sensitivity to these important requirements.

John Tower presided over our Geneva START negotiations, then promptly went to work for the very companies who had so much at stake in these sensitive negotiations.

John Tower received enormous sums from major U.S. arms manufacturers—more than $700,000—at the very time he was positioning himself on the Bush team for the Defense Secretariat—and then told Congress he did not even see an appearance of a conflict of interest problem. This utter insensitivity—stretching over several years—to what the Pentagon needs and what the public expects constitutes, in my mind, a pattern of behavior also sufficient to disqualify John Tower from consideration for the top defense post.

Mr. President, the decisions Senators make on nominations require highly subjective judgments. Yet, in 20 years in the Senate, I have always given the President the benefit of the doubt on nominations. I have opposed nominees only when I felt that their views of their responsibilities were so out of the mainstream, or their personal behavior was so unacceptable that I could not in good conscience support them. I have voted for every single one of the Bush administration's nominees which have thus far come before the Senate—even in cases like the Derwinski nomination, where I expressed some reservations. But I do not believe the Tower nomination is even a close call.

I oppose the Tower nomination in the strongest terms, and I urge all my colleagues—Democrat and Republican—to do likewise.

Mr. President, before closing I want to pay tribute to the work of the Armed Services Committee on this contentious nomination. My colleagues on the Armed Services Committee have been very careful in reviewing this nomination. Their investigation has been painstaking. So serious was the committee that it began work last summer to consider the standard which should be applied to civilian appointees in the Defense Department. Before the Presidential election, Senators NUNN and WARNER wrote to both Michael Dukakis and George Bush to outline the criteria that would guide the committee's consideration of nominees for civilian defense positions. The committee subsequently worked on strengthening the procedures for its review and its confirmation hearings.

The committee has gone about its work fairly and diligently. Regrettably, the effort by the White House to rally GOP loyalists behind their embattled nominee has injected partisanship into this very important debate. I know of several Republican Senators who do not believe John Tower is the right man for the Defense post, but who may walk the plank with the nominee because of White House pressure.

The White House's insistence on a rollcall will force the issue in the days ahead. I hope that once this vote is taken, we can resume efforts to restore confidence in the Pentagon's defense procurement efforts, and to work together in a bipartisan fashion to address the pressing national security question confronting our Nation.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT AGREEMENT

ARGUMENTS ON MOTIONS FILED BY JUDGE ALCEE L. HASTINGS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order

entered by the Senate on February 22 with respect to the Senate hearing arguments on and disposing of the motions filed by Judge Alcee L. Hastings to dismiss articles 1 through 15 and article 17 of the articles of impeachment be modified so that proceedings that were scheduled to occur on March 8 and 9 be postponed to occur on Wednesday, March 15 and Thursday, March 16. This request has been cleared and approved by the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and treaties which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

At 12:42 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolution:

H.J. Res. 22. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week."

The enrolled joint resolution was subsequently signed by the Acting President pro tempore [Mr. LIEBERMAN].

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION

The following bills and joint resolution were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. WALLOP:

S. 515. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to permit an employee to take compensatory time off in lieu of compensation for overtime hours, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

S. 516. A bill to prohibit age discrimination in apprenticeship programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 517. A bill to provide Federal court authority to enforce rights secured by the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOND (for himself and Mr. DANFORTH):

S. 518. A bill to provide for the establishment of White Haven National Historic Site in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. KERRY, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. GARN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. DOLE, Mr. COATS, and Mr. MACK):

S.J. Res. 72. Joint resolution to designate the period commencing May 7, 1989, and ending May 13, 1989, as "National Correctional Officers Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. STEVENS:

S. Res. 75. Resolution to provide procedural due process to individuals nominated by the President to be the principal officer of an Executive Department during consideration of such nominee by committees of the Senate; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. SIMPSON (for Mr. BOND) (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DANFORTH, and Mrs. KASSEBAUM):

S. Res. 76. Resolution commending Charles Price II; considered and agreed to.

By Mr. WALLOP (for himself and Mr. BOSCHWITZ):

S. Con. Res. 17. Concurrent resolution to provide that each committee of the Congress that reports employee benefit legislation shall secure an objective analysis of the impact of such legislation on employment and international competitiveness, and include such analysis in the committee report; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

STATEMENT ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. WALLOP:

S. 515. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to permit an employee to take compensatory time in lieu of compensation for overtime hours, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

S. 516. A bill to prohibit age discrimination in apprenticeship programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

LABOR REFORM LEGISLATION

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation which I had sponsored in several previous Congresses. Unfortunately, even good ideas can take a long time from conception to enactment as a public law. In this instance, I have two good ideas provided by my constituents in Wyoming.

Both bills involve labor issues. Since the Labor Committee has been reluctant to move these bills, I do look forward to offering them as amendments to appropriation bills in the Senate. In fact, I understand that the minimum wage bill will soon be sent to the Senate. This would be a perfect vehicle for one of my bills since both my bill and the minimum wage legislation amend the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The first bill, amending the FLSA, was brought to my attention by a company in Cheyenne, WY. It is a business with strong seasonal fluctuations. During the peaks, the employees would work well over the normal 40-hour work week, but in the troughs, their hours were well below that standard. Both the employer and employees decided that one solution to ensuring steady wages throughout the year was to utilize a compensatory time-off program.

During the busy seasons, employees would earn credit for extra hours worked. They could then take time off, with pay, during the slow season. Since many of the employees are women, they were able to spend more time with their children, particularly during summer vacations. The compensatory time concept is one many salaried professionals use.

Since the employees are paid on an hourly basis, they could not use the comp time proposal because of the requirements of the FLSA. My bill simply amends the act to allow voluntary comp time programs. We discussed this issue when the Senate considered legislation dealing with comp time for public employees. This matter will again be debated when we take up the minimum wage bill.

The second bill involves one of the most serious problems facing this country. With the aging of the population, we are entering a period of shortage for many skilled workers. One way to provide such workers is through apprenticeship programs approved by the U.S. Department of Labor. However, these programs have age requirements. If you are above a certain age, you cannot participate. The age limit is quite low, and rather shortsighted. One of my constituents was denied retraining because he just missed the age cutoff. This is a stupid waste of human resources. My bill is simple. It removes age limitations for apprenticeship programs. This is a small, but important contribution to our future employment training needs. I would ask that both bills be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objections, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(o) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employment under subsection (a) if, pursuant to a contract made between the employer and the employee individually or an agreement made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees entered into prior to the performance of the work, the employer at a written request of the employee grants the employee compensatory time off with pay in a subsequent workweek in lieu of payment of the number or hours worked in such current workweek in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a). For purposes of determining the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a), and the rate of pay due to the employee, compensatory time used by the employee shall be considered hours actually worked during the subsequent workweek in which actually used.".

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Age Discrimination in Apprenticeship Programs Act".

SEC. 2. The first section of the Act of August 16, 1937 (29 U.S.C. 50), popularly known as the National Apprenticeship Act, is amended by inserting "(a)" after the section designation and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) In promoting labor standards for the welfare of apprentices under subsection (a) of this section the Secretary shall assure that no program of apprenticeship discriminates against any individual because of his age in admission to, or employment in, any such program of apprenticeship.

"(2) For the purpose of this subsection, the prohibition contained in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be limited to individuals who are at least eighteen years of age but less than forty-five years of age.".●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 517. A bill to provide Federal court authority to enforce rights secured by the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDIAN CIVIL RIGHTS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Indian Civil Rights Act Amendments of 1989

TRIBAL GOVERNMENTS AND SOVEREIGNTY

In the 1800's, Congress began establishing Indian reservations on which Indian tribal governments could continue to exercise their sovereign powers. Native Americans, who are members of those tribal governments as well as U.S. and State citizens, are unique among racial minorities. Their actions may be restricted by tribal as well as State and Federal authority.

In that capacity, tribal governments exercise broad criminal and civil jurisdiction over both their members and their territory. They retain all of the powers not specifically denied them and which are consistent with their status as quasi-sovereign governments. While criminal jurisdiction is limited to tribal members, and perhaps nonmember Indians, tribes exercise broad civil, regulatory, and taxing authority over both Indians and non-Indians who reside within the reservations or who do business with tribal organizations.

While the decisions of these tribal governments reflect the history, culture, religious convictions, and shared values of the tribal leaders and members, the process of tribal government is largely based on a constitutional model. Most tribes, for example, are constitutional in nature and organized pursuant to the Indian Reorganization Act—Wheeler-Howard Act—of 1934. Very few, the Southwest Pueblos are the notable exception, have religious or other traditional forms of Indian governments.

Constitutionally, tribal governments differ from most State and Federal governments. Some of the fundamental checks and balances existing within the Federal and State constitutional framework, for example, are not present at the tribal level. Real power in many tribal governments rests with the tribal council or legislative branch. Tribal councils pass the ordinances, resolutions, and other processes which create tribal law. Through standing committees in such areas as social welfare, law enforcement, or the judiciary, tribal councils then perform executive, management, and implementation functions as well. The tribal councils often micromanage tribal programs, and their function is substantially different from the more general oversight role performed by non-Indian legislative bodies.

Separation of powers into coequal branches of government in order that one may check the potential abuse of another is not a concept well-established in tribal governments. As a result, tribal governments may lack pluralism, respond more to majority concerns, and ignore minority interests.

In that context, tribal courts exist in only about one-half of the tribal governments. Where courts do exist, they are often a creation of the tribal council and, therefore, subject to and dependent on the council. Rarely do tribal courts exist constitutionally as a separate coequal branch of the tribal government. As a consequence, tribal courts may lack the powers to review tribal council actions, may be otherwise limited jurisdictionally, and may lack independence from the tribal council or tribal chairman.

Tribal governments, because they are neither Federal nor State instruments and because they predate the Constitution, are not restricted by Federal or State constitutional authority. Similarly, tribal governments are not bound by many Federal civil rights statutes including, for example, civil actions for deprivations of statutory or constitutional rights, 42 U.S.C. section 1983, the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973, and laws prohibiting discrimination in employment, 42 U.S.C. 2000e-1.

THE 1968 INDIAN CIVIL RIGHTS ACT

However, Congress has plenary power over Indian matters. This exceptionally broad congressional authority is found in article I, section 8, clause 3 of the Constitution, which gives Congress the power to "regulate commerce * * * with Indian tribes." In an exercise of its plenary power, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights heard complaints of civil rights violations by tribal governments. The subcommittees held hearings from 1960-67 and documented widespread civil rights abuses on the part of tribal governments generally.

This record of civil rights abuses by tribes led to the enactment, over objection by tribes, of the Indian Civil Rights Act, as title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. The act applies substantial portions of the Constitution's Bill of Rights and the 14th amendment to tribal government in much the same way that the Federal Bill of Rights restricts the Federal Government. As set out in title II, section 202 of the Indian Civil Rights Act:

No Indian tribe in exercising powers of self-government shall—

(1) make or enforce any law prohibiting the free exercise of religion, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition for a redress of grievances;

(2) violate the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable search and seizures, nor issue warrants, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized;

(3) subject any person for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy;

(4) compel any person in any criminal case to be a witness against himself;

(5) taken any private property for a public use without just compensation;

(6) deny to any person in a criminal proceeding the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and at his own expense to have the assistance of counsel for his defense;

(7) require excessive bail, impose excessive fines, inflict cruel and unusual punishments, and in no event impose for conviction of any one offense any penalty or punishment greater than imprisonment for a term of six months or a fine of $500, or both;

(8) deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws or deprive any person of liberty or property without due process of law;

(9) pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law; or

(10) deny to any person accused of an offense punishable by imprisonment the right, upon request, to a trial by jury of not less than six persons.

In deference to Indian tribal values, however, certain constitutional provisions, including the first amendment's prohibition against establishing religions, were omitted. Other concessions were made to Indian tribal governments and values. Tribes, for example, need not provide indigent criminal defendants with counsel. Much of the concern, and the ultimate concessions, centered on the financial impact of granting broad rights to individuals who come in contact with tribal governments.

EARLY ENFORCEMENT

For 10 years, from 1968 to 1978, the Indian Civil Rights Act was routinely enforced in both tribal and Federal courts. Each Federal appellate court which considered the Indian Civil Rights Act; that is, the Fourth, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuit Courts, found the act within Congress' power and inferred a private right of action in Federal court to enforce the act's provisions.

The number of reported Federal district court cases between 1968 and 1978 was substantially less than 100 or roughly 10 per year nationwide. One way to read such a statistic is to see the positive impact or value that possible Federal civil rights enforcement has on encouraging tribal compliance with the act. Certainly the tribal exhaustion requirement which Federal courts routinely read into the act tended to resolve many issues at the tribal level without the need for Federal court action.

To be sure, there is little, if any, evidence that between 1968 and 1978 tribal governments suffered substantially as a result of the limited Federal court Indian Civil Rights Act enforcement. For example, there is no evidence that any tribe was forced to terminate its tribal government functions or became insolvent as a result of the act. In fact, there is some evidence that the act had a salutary effect on tribal government by, among other things, checking tribal abuse, providing for a more pluralistic tribal government, and encouraging nonreservation capital investment.

For the most part, pre-1978 Indian Civil Rights Act decisions enforced the act within the context or framework of existing tribal traditions, customs, and values. In due process cases, for example, Federal courts looked to tribal law or customs for a definition of what process was due. Tribal defense in equal protection litigation often relied on tribal "rational basis"; that is tribal law or custom, not available to non-Indian governments.

TERMINATION OF FEDERAL COURT REVIEW OF INDIAN CIVIL RIGHTS ACT ABUSES

Federal court review came to an end in 1978 with the Supreme Court's decision in Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978). There, the Supreme Court said the Indian Civil Rights Act does not provide for a waiver of sovereign immunity and, further, the act fails to provide a private right of action for individuals in Federal court. The Court found two distinct and "competing" purposes in the act: First, to protect individuals from tribal abuse of power; and second, to promote Indian self-government. Although the Court found that Congress has the power to provide a Federal forum, it said to do so may limit tribal court power and, thereby, lessen or infringe on tribal sovereignty or self-government. Accordingly, the Court refused to read in the Indian Civil Rights Act a right of action in Federal court which was not explicitly contained in the act. The Court went on to warn the tribes, however, that if they were deficient in applying and enforcing the act, Congress may in the future provide for Federal relief.

CRITICISM OF THE LACK OF FEDERAL COURT REVIEW

Over the last few years, substantial criticism has been raised over the burden often placed on plaintiffs by the Santa Clara Pueblo decision. While some tribal governments have gone to great lengths to ensure enforcement of the Indian Civil Rights Act guarantees, such is not the case with all tribes. In a 1984 report by the Presidential Commission on Indian Reservation Economies, the Commission attacked the fairness of some tribal government proceedings. In its report, the Commission states:

[F]ailure to adhere to a constitutional principle separating executive, legislative and judicial powers has had a detrimental effect on governmental functioning. For example, the failure to establish a clear separation of powers between the tribal council and the tribal judiciary has resulted in political interference with tribal courts, weakening their independence, and raising doubts about fairness and the rule of law. * * * Both Indians and non-Indians complain of political discrimination against them by tribal governments and tribal courts which are arms of tribal governments. Access to tribal physical resources, to the benefits of tribally managed programs, and to tribal employment is considered to be unfair by many Indians. Decisions rendered by tribal courts, which are controlled by tribal councils, are also perceived to be unfair by Indians and non-Indians.

Similar criticism has also been raised by the Federal courts. In the case of Shortbull v. Looking Elk, 677, F.2d 645 (8th Cir. 1982), the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed a case in which the plaintiff claimed that he was wrongfully refused permission to run for tribal office by an action of the tribal council. In addressing the lack of protection for the plaintiff's rights under the Indian Civil Rights Act, the court stated:

We must, however, express serious concern that Shortbull's rights under [Sec.] 1302 of the Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA) may never be vindicated. Shortbull alleges that the tribal court, Chief Judge Red Shirt, ruled that he was entitled to run in the primary election because of the Tribal Council's January 24 resolution. It appears that because of this ruling, Judge Red Shirt was removed from office and was replaced by a judge more sympathetic to the Tribal Executive Committee, who quashed Judge Red Shirt's orders. Such actions raise serious questions under the Indian Civil Rights Act, but because the Supreme Court determined in Santa Clara Pueblo that there is no private right of action under the IRCA, Shortbull has no remedy. * * *

We are thus presented with a situation in which Shortbull has no remedy within the tribal machinery nor with the tribal officials in whose election he cannot participate [citations omitted], unless and until Congress provides otherwise. [Citing Santa Clara Pueblo.] We question whether such a result is justified on the grounds of maintaining tribal autonomy and self-government: it frustrates the ICRA's purpose of "protect[ing] individual Indians from the arbitrary and unjust actions of tribal governments," and in this case it renders the rights provided by ICRA meaningless.

The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals also attacked the current enforcement situation in the case of Dry Creek Lodge, Inc. v. Arapahoe and Shoshone Tribes, 623 F.2d 682 (10th Cir. 1980). In one of the few non-habeas corpus Indian Civil Rights Act cases to provide a federal forum by narrowly construing the Santa Clara Pueblo decision, the court provides some useful insights with reference to the facts and the resulting lack of fairness in that case:

Plaintiffs Cook, who are non-Indians, had owned the 160-acre tract for about ten years and had lived there. They decided to build a guest lodge for hunting, and consulted the superintendent of the reservation about the matter. He advised them that projects of this type were encouraged to provide employment. He also stated that there would be no access problem. A license to plaintiffs Cooks was issued for the business. The individuals then formed Dry Creek Lodge, Inc. to build the facilities. This was done with an SBA loan. The lodge was completed and opened, but the next day the Tribes closed the road at the request of a nearby Indian family, . . .

The [tribal Joint Business] Council directed that access to the Dry Creek Lodge be prevented by the federal officers, and the [Indian family] were apparently to erect the barricade. With the road blocked the persons on the Dry Creek land could not get out and were for all practical purposes confined there until a federal court issued a temporary restraining order. Thereafter the plaintiffs sought a remedy with the tribal court, but were refused access to it. The judge indicated he could not incur the displeasure of the Council and that consent of the Council would be needed. 25 C.F.R. Sec. 11.22. The consent was not given. The state court cases were removed to the federal court. In the federal court the defendants urged that there was no remedy—no jurisdiction. * * * The Tribal Business Council, according to the minutes, directed that the differences between the [Indian] family and the plaintiffs be settled by self-help, and this was done. The plaintiffs, however, did not respond the same way. The defendants argue here, as they did in the trial court, that the plaintiffs have no remedy. There is no forum where the dispute can be resolved and the personal property rights asserted by plaintiffs be considered. * * *

The plaintiffs alleged that their personal and property rights under the Constitution had been violated by the defendants. A jury so found and awarded damages. There must exist a remedy for parties in the position of plaintiffs to have the dispute resolved in an orderly manner. To hold that they have access to no court is to hold that they have constitutional rights but have no remedy. The self-help which was suggested to shut down plaintiffs' "business," according to the Council minutes, and which was carried out with the help of the federal police, does not appear to be a suitable device to determine constitutional rights.

In that case, even the dissenting judge acknowledged that dilemma when he stated:

To me this is a most disturbing case because of the result I feel compelled to reach. The jury found a violation of the plaintiffs' civil rights recognized by [section] 1302 of the Indian Civil Rights Act, under the most distressing circumstances. And yet it seems we must say that the doors are closed against any orderly redress for the wrongs. State and federal courts are barred by the immunity doctrine from hearing the claims and access was denied to the tribal court, as the majority opinion points out. * * *

Only recently, this criticism by the Federal courts of the status quo was reaffirmed by the U.S. District Court for the District of Montana in the case of Little Horn State Bank versus Crow Tribal Court. After a lengthy review of the facts in which the plaintiff was repeatedly denied his rights by the defendant, the Judge went on to state.

This Court is well aware of the continued promotion of tribal self-government and self-determination. In National Farmers Union Ins. Co. v. Crow Tribe [citation omitted], the Supreme Court directed the federal district court to give tribal legal institutions the "proper respect" by staying its hand in order to allow the Tribal Court a "full opportunity to consider the issues before them." [Citation omitted.] This Court, in keeping with its obligation to uphold the law, will honor that directive.

However, it has become extremely difficult to do so in the face of such decidedly egregious facts as are presented herein. Plaintiff has recognized the sovereignty of the Tribe and has valiantly tried to operate within the Tribal Court system, seeking its approval of a valid judgment entered in the courts of the State of Montana, and assistance in enforcing the same. The Crow Tribal Court, acting as a sort of "kangaroo court", has made no pretense of due process or judicial integrity. Plaintiff was met not only with bias and uncooperativeness, but with a blatantly arbitrary denial of any semblance of due process. The tribal judge's conduct makes a mockery of any orderly system of justice, and renders any attempt to deal with the Tribe in a professional and competent manner a farce. The Court seriously questions whether the conduct of the Tribal Court is befitting the title of a sovereign, and the respect and deference customarily accorded along with that status.

It would appear that the Crow Tribal government changes judges at a whim, to the detriment of non-Indian litigants, and of the Tribe. As a result, the Tribal Court lacks any continuity and uniform precedent which is the foundation of our judicial system. While the tribal members enjoy the protection of their rights under both the United States Constitution and the ICRA, depending on the forum, it appears that non-Indians are not granted the same privilege of dual citizenship in Tribal Court. If the Crow Tribe wishes to earn the respect and cooperation of its non-Indian neighbors, it must do more to engender that respect and cooperation, not abuse those neighbors who attempt to work within its system.

Let me reiterate that these abuses that are cited by the courts are not necessarily occurring in all or even a majority of the tribal governments. Nevertheless, the situation was serious enough to warrant congressional action in 1968, and it appears that at least with some tribes such is still the case.

THE NEED FOR LEGISLATION

The concerns of the courts that I have been quoting are further supported by an extensive record of the lack of Indian Civil Rights Act enforcement that is currently being compiled by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. For the last couple of years, the Commission has been holding a series of hearings on this issue. While the Commission's report is not yet complete, the transcripts and hearing records contain many statements that further support the allegations of failure by some tribal governments to adequately enforce the civil rights guaranteed to both tribal and nontribal reservation residents alike.

Because of the enforcement problems that have occurred since the Santa Clara Pueblo case, the time has now come to follow the Supreme Court's dictum and legislate a Federal court remedy. A review of post-Santa Clara Pueblo Federal and tribal caselaw, existing Federal studies, news reports, and other available information, makes clear that rights secured by the Indian Civil Rights Act have been less than fully enforced.

In earlier testimony before the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, the Department of Justice provided some interesting statistics and background with respect to its involvement and monitoring of Indian Civil Rights Act enforcement. I would like to share some of that testimony with my colleagues at this point:

In the 7 years prior to Santa Clara, the Department of Justice received about 280 complaints of ICRA violations on the part of tribal governments. ICRA complaints during this period accounted for just over 18% of all civil rights complaints involving Indians. Several of these matters were settled by informal discussion between the Department and the affected tribes. Others were not pursued because of non-ICRA commitments on [the part of the Department]. The Department did, however, participate in 6 federal civil lawsuits which raised ICRA issues, including 2 brought solely on ICRA claims. No cases have been brought subsequent to Santa Clara. Most complaints brought to the Department's attention pre-Santa Clara involved allegations of tribal election irregularities. Other alleged violations occurred in the area of tribal employment, law enforcement, i.e. police and court irregularities, and housing assignment policies.

Since the Court's 1978 decision in Santa Clara, the Justice Department has received about 45 ICRA complaints alleging violations of the civil rights of Indians by tribal governments. No action has been taken on any complaint and no effort has been made, post Santa Clara, to invoke the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Seventeen complaints allege tribal court irregularities including a failure to allow retained attorneys to appear in tribal court, a failure to permit defendants an opportunity to be heard and the failure to afford criminal defendants a trial by jury. Thirteen complaints allege flaws in the tribal election process including improper interference by the tribal council, fraud and malapportioned election districts. Six complaints allege improper tribal hiring practices including political interference and nepotism. Four complaints allege housing violations including noncompliance with tribal housing assignment policies, favoritism and improper interference by the tribal council. The remaining miscellaneous complaints range from an alleged failure to provide tribal benefits equally to all members (similar to the Santa Clara facts) to an allegation of unsanitary and inadequate tribal jail conditions.

The following incidents are representative of the more serious complaints received by the Department since Santa Clara and, to our knowledge, which have gone unreviewed by federal courts. On March 13, 1979 a tribal member was arrested for disorderly conduct by tribal officials. An investigation of the circumstances surrounding his arrest, trial and punishment revealed the following information. The victim was held without bail in pretrial confinement for 5 days. On March 18, 1979 he was transported from the jail and taken to a room containing tribal officials. All other persons were removed from the room. The victim was forced to kneel in front of the tribal officials. He was told that he was charged with disorderly conduct and asked several questions concerning his arrest on March 13th. He was never informed of the statutory rights set out in the ICRA. After a time, a tribal official asked that a rawhide whip about 2 feet long be brought in the room. When it arrived, the official instructed a subordinate to whip the victim four times, which was done. The victim was sentenced to 30 additional days in jail and returned to jail without medical attention. Other information confirms that the victim's account is an accurate description of how trials are conducted at the tribe. Non-public proceedings, no representation by counsel, no notification of procedural rights and whipping are all customary in criminal proceedings.

A Southwest tribe is districted into several separate council districts. Federal courts have held that the due process clause of the ICRA requires that tribal council districts comply with one person, one vote requirements. However, the 1982 election districts exceed the maximum permissible derivation by approximately 200-400% depending upon population base used. A recent redistricting has reduced that deviation to approximately 70%.

In a 1982 complaint, an attorney wrote [the Department] alleging that a tribe refused to permit him to represent his client. The attorney alleged that his client was required to present a case in tribal court while the attorney was present "but only as an observer". According to the attorney's account, when he spoke up on behalf of his client, members of the tribal council tried to have him "removed from the courtroom altogether." He concludes his letter with the observation that "[t]he tribal court system is a total mockery of justice at best and more realistically a fraud" on the tribal members. Subsequently the attorney was "removed" from the reservation by tribal law enforcement authorities. In a February 20, 1985 letter, a tribal member wrote to complain that she and others "have been cheated in tribal elections". She also complained that tribal members are "coerced into compliance thru [sic] fear of losing their jobs and our civil rights have been flagrantly violated." She told [the Department] that she "cannot be identified for fear of job reprisal". Finally, [the Department] received a September 6, 1985 letter from an Indian who requested our "help in protecting [tribal members] from our government". Following the submission of a recall petition, the tribal council went through the signatures systematically "giving people the choice of being suspended from employment or publicly apologizing for signing the Petition". The letter continues with the allegation that the "Council is threatening us * * * All we want is the right to vote and elect our leaders. We understand this is supposed to be a real right, but so far there is no avenue for enforcement.

In a recent letter from the Justice Department to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, the Department provides a summary of complaints it has received since the Santa Clara Pueblo decision. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of that letter and the incident summary be included in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, while abuse of rights by individual tribal officials has surfaced since Santa Clara Pueblo; for example, allegations that tribal judges fail to insist on proper standards prior to issuing search warrants, structural problems are also present and, arguably, more important.

Examples of structural Indian Civil Rights Act problems include the failure of tribal governments to insist on independent judicial review or an equally effective Indian Civil Rights Act compliance procedure. Some tribal governments fail to create tribal courts or, where they do exist, extend to them the power of judicial review.

For example, recent news reports out of my home State of Utah indicate that last year a tribal judge on the Ute Indian Reservation was dismissed from his position by the reservation Business Committee when the judge found the committee in contempt of court for failure to pay more than $500 million in back dividends to new tribal members. While the news articles are not detailed as to all of the specific facts of that case, they do point out that the tribal government has passed a new law prohibiting legal action against the tribe in tribal court. If that is the case, and I believe that it is, then given the Supreme Court ruling in Santa Clara Pueblo that Indian civil rights actions may not be brought in Federal courts, it would appear that at least on the Ute Reservation there is no possibility of enforcing the 1968 Indian Civil Rights Act in cases involving the tribal government.

This situation and other complaints regarding lack of enforcement of the Indian Civil Rights Act warrant serious congressional action in the form of hearings. We must determine the scope of the problem and take corrective action in the form of legislation to ensure that individuals will have their civil rights enforced.

Efforts have been made to increase Federal funding and provide effective training programs for tribal court systems. However, while appropriate funding and training levels are important, they will not resolve the Indian Civil Rights Act enforcement problems that do exist. The remedy lies with Federal court enforcement. Federal court enforcement, coupled with a requirement of exhaustion of tribal remedies and limited to equitable relief, will achieve the goal to providing an effective Indian Civil Rights Act compliance program without unnecessarily limiting other legitimate tribal goals.

The bill that I am introducing today does just that. It provides for Federal court review and enforcement after an individual has exhausted his or her tribal remedies. The bill will also prohibit the defense of sovereign immunity in civil rights cases. It is a fair and balanced solution to ensure that all citizens, both Indian and non-Indian, enjoy basic civil rights.

At this point, I would like to explain each section of the bill

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Section 1 provides that the act may be cited as the "Indian Civil Rights Act Amendments of 1989."

Section 2 adds a new compliance section of the Indian Civil Rights Act, section 204, following the existing three sections: section 201 [25 U.S.C. 1301], "Definitions"; section 202 [section 1302], "Constitutional rights"; and section 203 [section 1303], "Habeas corpus".

Section 204(a) grants Federal district courts jurisdiction of civil actions alleging a denial of rights enumerated in section 202 of the act. The subsection also prohibits the defense of sovereign immunity in civil actions brought to enforce compliance with section 202.

Subsection 204(b) provides an individual, or the Attorney General, with a right of action in the Federal district courts for declaratory, injunctive or other equitable relief if a tribe fails to comply with the individual's civil rights provided by the act. This subsection requires, as a prerequisite to an aggrieved individual's filing suit, the exhaustion of tribal remedies. The tribal remedies, however, must be timely and reasonable under the circumstances so that an individual is protected from dilatory governmental decisionmaking. The Attorney General is not subject to the exhaustion requirement of this subsection.

Relief is strictly limited by subsection 204(b), whether the plaintiff is an aggrieved individual or the Attorney General, to equitable relief, such as a declaratory judgment, an injunction, or other nonmonetary equitable remedies. The equitable relief may be granted against an Indian tribe, tribal organization, or tribal official.

Subsection 204(c) compels Federal district courts to adopt the findings of fact of tribal courts when such findings have been made, unless the Federal district court makes a determination that one of eight listed irregularities occurred respecting the tribal court's procedures. Only in the event of one of the following irregularities, will the Federal court conduct a de novo review of the case:

(1) "The tribal court was not fully independent from the tribal legislative or executive authority." As used in subsection 204(c)(1), "fully independent from the tribal legislative or executive authority" means a separate and autonomous tribal judiciary which (as in the case of the federal and state governments) is free from the control of other branches of government. In deciding questions of judicial independence, the language quoted above is meant to apply standards no more rigorous than those applicable to state court judges. For example see American Bar Association, Code of Judicial Conduct, Canon 1 ("A judge should participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing, and should himself observe, high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary may be preserved."). Nothing in this subsection is meant to restrict the appropriate discipline of judges who violate established canons of judicial ethics or published standards of judicial conduct. Evidence of judicial misconduct, such as improper ex-parte communications with counsel for a litigating party, may under appropriate circumstances also serve as the basis for a finding of a lack of judicial independence.

(2) "The tribal court was not authorized to or did not finally determine matters of law and fact." As used in subsection 204(c)(2), "authorized" refers to authorization by tribal constitution, statute, or ordinance.

(3) The tribe or those subject to the Act are allowed to interpose a defense of immunity.

(4) The merits of the factual dispute have not been resolved.

(5) The factfinding procedure employed did not adequately afford a full and fair hearing.

(6) The material facts are not adequately developed.

(7) A full, fair, and adequate hearing was not provided.

(8) The factual findings are not fairly supported by the record.

Subsection 204(d) required the Federal courts to accord due deference to the interpretation of the tribal court of tribal laws and customs whenever a question of tribal law is at issue.

Mr. President, the bill that I am introducing today strikes a legitimate balance between the interests of the tribal governments in exercising their powers of self-government and the rights which Congress extended to individuals through the 1968 Indian Civil Rights Act. It was endorsed by the administration last year and I am reintroducing it in the same form. I would encourage my colleagues to carefully examine this issue and support this effort to protect the rights of all Americans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 517

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Civil Rights Act Amendments of 1989".

SEC. 2. Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 (Public Law 90-284, 25 U.S.C. 1301 et seq.), commonly called the Indian Civil Rights Act or the Indian Bill of Rights, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"CIVIL ACTIONS

"SEC. 204. (a) Compliance With Section 202.—Federal district courts shall have jurisdiction of civil rights actions alleging a failure to comply with rights secured by this Act. Sovereign immunity shall not constitute a defense to such an action.

"(b) Any aggrieved individual, following the exhaustion of such tribal remedies as may be both timely and reasonable under the circumstances, or the Attorney General on behalf of the United States, may initiate an action in Federal district court for declaratory, injunctive or other equitable relief against an Indian tribe, tribal organization, or official thereof, alleging a failure to comply with rights secured by this Act.

"(c) In any civil action brought by an aggrieved individual, or by the Attorney General, the Federal district court shall adopt the findings of fact of the tribal court, if such findings have been made, unless the district court determines that:

"(1) the tribal court was not fully independent from the tribal legislative or executive authority;

"(2) the tribal court was not authorized to or did not finally determine matters of law and fact;

"(3) the tribal court permitted those subject to the Act, on issues of declaratory, injunctive or other equitable relief, to interpose a defense of immunity;

"(4) The tribal court failed to resolve the merits of the factual dispute;

"(5) the tribal court employed a factfinding procedure not adequate to afford a full and fair hearing;

"(6) the tribal court did not adequately develop material facts;

"(7) the tribal court failed to provide a full, fair, and adequate hearing; or

"(8) the factual determinations of the tribal court are not fairly supported by the record, in which event the district court shall conduct a de novo review of the allegations contained in the complaint.

"(d) In any civil actions brought under this Act the Federal court shall, whenever a question of tribal law is at issue, accord due deference to the interpretation of the tribal court of tribal laws and customs.".

Re: Allegations of ICRA Violations Post Santa Clara Pueblo versus Martinez

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD,
General Counsel, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: As requested, I have enclosed a summary of alleged ICRA violations contained in our files. The summary includes only those matters or allegations brought to our attention subsequent to Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978). I have not included other claims of ICRA violations from sources such as the Indian Law Reporter, litigated federal cases or the available literature. I did, however, include matters reported in the news media and note that certain matters outlined below may also have been made available to the Civil Rights Commission. In addition, because we are no longer engaged in ICRA enforcement activity, the allegations contained in the summary remain unverified.

The 71 separate complaints listed below allege a total of 98 violations of the ICRA. The complaints name 32 different Indian tribes located in 12 states. Areas with the heaviest complaint activity include tribes located in South Dakota with 25 complaints, Arizona with 15 complaints and Minnesota with 10 complaints. One tribe is the subject of 14 separate complaints, some of which allege more than one ICRA violation, and 3 other tribes are the subject of 10, 7 and 6 complaints respectively. The remaining 28 tribes are named in one or two ICRA complaints.

The 98 alleged ICRA violations may be categorized as follows:

Alleged violations	Number of allegations
1. Tribal court practices	28
2. Voting or election complaints	25
3. Hiring or employment irregularities	12
4. Tribal council activity generally	11
5. Free press infringements	5
6. Housing assignment policies	4
7. Right to counsel allegations	3
8. Taking of private property without compensation	2
9. Vague criminal statutes	1
10. Child custody procedures	1
11. Jail conditions	1
12. Membership practices	1
13. Cruel and unusual punishment	1
14. Improper removal from the reservation	1
15. Arrest and search procedures	1
16. Racial discrimination	1

By year, the 712 complaints of ICRA violations can be broken down as follows:

Year	Number of complaints
1979	6
1980	2
1981	1
1982	4
1984	1
1985	6
1986	13
1988	21

I hope you find this information useful. If you should have any questions, please call the undersigned on 633-4701.

Sincerely,

JAMES P. TURNER,
Acting Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division.
JAMES M. SCHERMERHORN,
Special Litigation Counsel.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—IRCA COMPLAINTS POST SANTA CLARA PUEBLO VERSUS MARTINEZ

Date of incident	ICRA section	Alleged violation	Summary of incident
1982	1302(8)	Due process (threats and intimidation)	Tribal authorities allegedly attempted to force the complainant to leave the tribe because she complained of improper treatment of her child in the tribal day care center.
1979	1302(8)	Due process (vague criminal statutes)	Allegation that tribal "disorderly conduct" and "contributing to the delinquency of a minor" statutes are vague and, accordingly, violate due process guarantees codified in the ICRA.
1982	1302(8)	Due process (child custody)	Allegation that the complainant was unfairly treated in a child custody proceeding.
1985	1302(8)	Due process (jail conditions)	Allegation that tribal jail conditions violate due process and cruel and unusual punishment provisions of the ICRA. Specifically, the complaint alleges unhealthy, unsanitary and unsafe jail conditions.
1981	1302(8)	Due process (exparte tribal court proceedings)	Allegation that children were taken from parents in child custody proceedings without notice pursuant to an ex parte court order allegedly in violation of the due process provisions of the ICRA.
1982	1302(8)	Equal protection (voting/elections)	Malapportioned tribal council election districts allegedly violate the one person/one vote equal protection standard.
1985	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation of malapportioned tribal council election districts in violation of the one person/one vote equal protection standard.

Date of incident	ICRA section	Alleged violation	Summary of incident
1988	1302(8)	Due process (voting/election)	Allegation that a denial of the right to vote in a tribal election was motivated by a fear that the complainant may vote for a candidate not approved of by an election official.
1988	1302(8)	Equal protection (voting/elections)	Off reservation members of the tribe claim discrimination in voting in tribal elections. Allegedly only members of the tribe who live on the reservation can participate in tribal elections.
1985	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation that the tribal council is unlawfully conducting business without a quorum in violation of the tribal constitution and ICRA.
1984	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation that a tribal ordinance "forever barr[ing]" individuals from running for tribal office violates the ICRA.
1985	1302(8)	Due process (interference with a tribal court order)	Tribal council allegedly voted to "wipe away and overrule the [tribal] appellate court's decision . . .".
1983	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation that a tribal council referendum to "correct" the election district apportionment set by the federal court in Brown versus United States is "invalid because it is contrary to the Indian Civil Rights Acts".
1980	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Tribal resolution declaring a tribal election null and void was allegedly "enacted without notice or hearing or other requirements of due process, and the winners of several individual election contests were possibly denied rights in disregard of due process required by the Indian Civil Rights Act."
1986	1302(8)	Due process (improper tribal hiring)	Allegation raises "instances wherein it appeared to me that due process and civil rights of individuals and groups were denied at the tribal level." The complaint alleging, among other things, that nonmerit hiring by the tribe constituted "nepotism" and "cronyism".
1979	1302(8)	Due process (removal from employment)	Letter alleging ICRA violations regarding the firing of a tribal employee by the tribe. Also alleged is the noncompliance with Rule 6 of the tribal code indicating a preference for the issuance of a criminal summons instead of an arrest warrant.
1979	1302(8)	Due process (abuse of tribal court authority)	Allegation that because he sought a divorce in the state court rather than the tribal court, the tribal judge awarded the complainant's property to his former wife and, acting in excess of tribal authority, threatened the complainant's welfare.
1981	1302(8)	Due process (housing assignment policies)	Allegation of improper tribal interference in a housing project assignment policies and that the tribal court process was used to silence dissent. Favoritism alleged in a housing assignment including discrimination on the basis of sex.
1978	1302(4) 1302(6)	No assistance of counsel, failure to permit confrontation of witnesses, no compulsory process, and the failure to advise defendants of the right not to be compelled to provide evidence against themselves..	Allegation that the tribe fails to advise criminal defendants of their right to assistance of counsel at no expense to the tribe, their right to confront witnesses who may appear against them, their right to compulsory process and their right not to be compelled to provide evidence against themselves.
1978	1302(8)	Equal Protection (voting/elections)	Allegation that malapportioned tribal council election districts violate one person, one vote equal protection standards.
1978	1302(8)	Due process (lack of notice)	Allegation that the tribe improperly interfered with complainant's ownership of certain property and failed to notify them of court action.
1988	1302(8)	Due process (Tribal court procedure)	General allegation that the tribal court failed to follow tribal law and violated the tribal constitution.
1988	1302(8)	Due process (employment)	Allegation that the complainant was fired from his tribal job in violation of the tribal merit employment code.

1986	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Alleged due process violations in a tribal recall election including the failure to follow tribal constitutional mandates.
1988	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation that a tribal faction complied with the tribal code in pressing a recall election but the tribal council and tribal court ignored the recall petitions.
1979	1302(8)	Due process (tribal employment practices)	Allegation that the clerk of the tribal court and the tribal prosecutor were fired without cause. The new chairman allegedly appointed family members to the vacant positions.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (employment)	Alleged favoritism and nepotism by tribal council in tribal hiring and employment practices. "Neoptism is bad on our res[ervation] . . .".
1979	1302(5) 1302(6) 1302(7) 1302(8)	Due process (criminal procedure, cruel and unusual punishment)	Complainant alleges he was illegally arrested, detained for 5 days without bond, provided no opportunity to defend himself at a hearing, and whipped by tribal authorities.
1979	1302(8)	Due process (tribal court procedure)	Victim alleges that he was mistreated by the tribal court, specifically that he was denied an appeal and given an excessive sentence as a result of improper influence by tribal officials on the tribal judge.
1978	1302(6)	Right to counsel	Allegation that the tribe refused to allow attorneys to practice in tribal court.
1980	1302(1)	Freedom of the press	Allegedly a tribal resolution "barred and restricted" the news media from the reservation.
1979	1302(1)	Freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, Bill of Attainder	Allegation that the tribe removed the treasurer under circumstance which "were in the nature of a bill of attainder" and "so mixed with unlawful provisions so as to evidence on their face the inadequacy of the tribal council as a forum for resolving at least this particular type of dispute. The Tribal Council's resolutions seek to restrain the Treasurer's right to freedom of speech and freedom of assembly and to punish her for the exercise of those basic freedoms contrary to the provision of the Indian Civil Rights Act."
1982	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegation of considerable controversy "surrounding the handling of absentee ballots' and other election problems.
1988	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Allegations of "internal strife"and "unqualified" tribal office candidates resulted in an "illegally held" election.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (removal from reservation)	Allegation that the tribal council and tribal court acted to remove or exclude a nonmember of the tribe from the reservation, allegedly without the opportunity to be heard.
1985	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Newspaper editorial (and accompanying cartoon) alleges that tribal councils have passed resolutions "forbidding certain individuals to run for office."
1987	1302(8)	Due process (limiting tribal court jurisdiction)	Allegations that a tribal resolution "specially denies jurisdiction to the . . . CFR court over any litigation that may be construed as 'internal tribal conflict' and, as a result, precludes ICRA challenges in tribal court."
1985	1302(8)	Due process (Tribal council interference with the tribal court)	Allegation of interference by tribal council in the work of the tribal court. Tribal council allegedly ordered a tribal judge to hear a case in which the judge had disqualified himself on conflict of interest grounds.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (tribal court procedures)	Allegation that "our Indian Civil Rights have been violated by the tribal courts . . ." Specially, the complainant alleges that the tribal court "didn't give us notice nor subpoenas to our witnesses" for a court hearing.
1986	1302(5) 1302(8)	Due process (taking of property)	Allegation of a denial of "human rights" by the former tribal council in exercising the tribe's right of eminent domain. Allegation that those who refused to sell land for a new road were "arrested or assaulted."
1988	1302(8)	Due process (employment and elections)	Allegation that the former chief judge of the tribal court "was replaced without cause and probable in violation of the tribal code." The complaint describes the tribal court system as one ". . . which [does not] presently inspire confidence." The complainant describes past tribal elections as having "an element of threat of personal harm . . .".
1986	1302(8)	Due process/equal protection (voting/elections)	The tribal council, acting as an appellate court, allegedly overturned the decision of the tribal court and denied a women tribal member the opportunity to run for tribal office. According to the complaint, the tribal council believes the tribal ". . . constitution expressly denies women the right to hold office."
1987	1302(8)	Due process (employment)	Complaint alleges that the tribal council overruled both the tribal court and the tribal appellate court's finding that the plaintiff was illegally terminated from her position as the tribe's higher education director.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (employment)	Complaint alleges that educated Indians are "politically . . . black-listed" and "discriminated against by our officials" in employment.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (tribal court procedure)	Complaint alleges a denial of due process in tribal court. Specifically, the complaint alleges faulty extradition procedures and the failure of the tribal court to uniformly apply the tribal code.
1987	1302(8) 1302(7)	Due process (illegal consecutive sentencing)	Allegation that a defendant was convicted of 15 criminal charges and sentenced to serve 10 consecutive sentences of 6 months each for a total sentence of 5 years in jail which exceeds the ICRA's one (1) year maximum sentence provision.
1987	1302(8) 1302(7)	Due process (illegal consecutive sentencing)	Allegation that a tribal inmate is serving a 6 year prison sentence which exceeds the ICRA's one (1) year maximum sentence provision.
1986	1302(8)	Due process (Favoritism by tribal court)	Allegation that a tribal court advocate's client was treated unfairly by a tribal judge in a divorce proceeding. Specifically, the victim was forced to accept much of the financial liability resulting from the marriage with very little of the assets. Allegedly this occurred because the tribal judge was a school acquaintance of the successful party in the divorce proceeding and was biased against her client.
1979	1302(8)	Due process (voting/elections)	Complaint alleges that "[f]or 73 years [t]he tribe has been denied the right to a fair election" because of existing tribal elections procedures.
1986	1302(8) 1302(2)	Due process (illegal arrest and warrantless search procedures)	Allegation that tribal police chief violates proper arrest and search procedures. Complaint asks "[h]ow much more must our civil rights be violated before he is stopped or before anyone comes to our aide."

S. 518. A bill to provide for the establishment of White Haven National Historic Site in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

WHITE HAVEN NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation today with my colleague from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, which will preserve President Ulysses S. Grant's home, known as White Haven, in Grantwood Village, MO. President Grant is the only President whose home is not preserved by the Federal Government. Our legislation would correct that oversight by authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the donation of White Haven by its current owner, St. Louis County, and designate it as a national historic site. The National Park Service would administer the property.

White Haven was the childhood home of President Grant's wife, Julia Dent Grant. Grant and his wife lived at White Haven from 1854 to 1860, farming the land and raising a family. Although they moved away in 1860, they maintained ownership of White Haven and visited it often. St. Louis County currently owns the property, which consists of 10 acres of land, the 180-year-old main house and several smaller buildings.

This legislation deserves support for several reasons. First, as I mentioned earlier, Grant is the only President not represented in our National Park System. Every other President is represented by one or more sites of personal or historical significance to them. Given his place in our national history, it is important that this omission be corrected. Second, the State of Missouri and St. Louis County have shown a strong commitment to White Haven by funding the aquisition cost. They saved it from demolition in 1986 by purchsing it from a private group for $510,000. The only costs to the Federal Government would be modest amounts for staffing and maintenance. Finally, the National Park Service would like to add this historical property to our National Park System but cannot do so without congressional approval.

Prof. John Simon, executive director of the Ulysses S. Grant Association located at Southern Illinois University, has prepared an excellent summary of the history of White Haven. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this summary be placed in the RECORD at the end of my statement.

Mr. President, this legislation would ensure the preservation of an important historical site and I urge my colleagues' support for it.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 518

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ESTABLISHMENT OF WHITE HAVEN NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE.

In order to preserve in public ownership for the benefit and inspiration of all Americans the key property associated with the personal lives of General and President Ulysses S. Grant and First Lady Julia Dent Grant, knowledge of which is essential to understanding his meteoric rise to greatness as well as his heroic deeds and public service and her partnership in them, there is hereby established the White Haven National Historic Site near St. Louis, Missouri.

SEC. 2. ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY.

(a) REAL PROPERTY.—The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire by donation the property and improvements thereon known as White Haven in the unincorporated portion of St. Louis County known as Grantwood Village within the area generally depicted on the map entitled "Boundary Map, White Haven National Historic Site," numbered WHHA-00, 000 and dated July, 1988. The map shall be on file and available for public inspection in the offices of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior.

(b) PERSONAL PROPERTY.—The Secretary is authorized to acquire by donation or purchase with donated or appropriated funds personal property directly associated with White Haven or General or Mrs. Grant for the purposes of the national historic site.

SEC. 3. ADMINISTRATION OF HISTORIC SITE.

The property acquired pursuant to the section 1 shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535), as amended and supplemented and the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666).

SEC. 4. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

THE ULYSSES S. GRANT ASSOCIATION,
Carbondale, IL, February 1, 1989.

Senator CHRISTOPHER S. BOND,
Senate Russell Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BOND: I am grateful for this opportunity to write briefly about the importance of White Haven in the life of Ulysses S. Grant in order to further the establishment of the property as a National Historic Site.

In 1965, I first visited White Haven and have revisited it several times, once as a weekend guest, never failing to be impressed by the lingering presence of Grant or to be reminded by the structure itself of the unusual nature of his career.

To understand Grant is to appreciate his reluctance to serve as an army officer, a pattern that extends from his original appointment to the U.S. Military Academy through his commissioning as general. He resigned from the army in 1854 intending to become a farmer on his father-in-law's White Haven estate, rejoining his wife and two children, one of whom he had never seen, after a two-year absence on the Pacific Coast. The family first lived at White Haven, where Grant had courted his future wife, then moved to the nearby house of Lewis Dent, before occupying the log house, ironically named Hardscrabble, that Grant had built himself. Hardscrabble, as restored, now stands across the road from White Haven, a poignant reminder that in the century of log cabins, only one future president himself built one for his family to live in, and the contrast between Hardscrabble and White Haven indicates the difficulty that Grant faced in pursuing a new career. The Grants lived in Hardscrabble for approximately four months before moving back to White Haven, following the death of Mrs. Grant's mother. Further financial reverses took Grant from White Haven to downtown St. Louis and eventually to Galena, but his fondness for his wife's home influenced him during the Civil War to begin to buy portions of this estate as his postwar home.

White Haven also evokes Grant through its southern architecture, serving as a reminder that Grant married into a slaveholding family, had as many friends in the South as in the North, and that the bonds sundered in 1861 had repercussions within his own family.

Presented with a large and handsome house in Galena soon after the end of the Civil War, Grant did not even revisit it for some three years, then stayed in Galena during the presidential campaign in 1868 largely to avoid all participation in politics. Once the votes were in, Grant left Galena to return only for the briefest of visits thereafter. Although Galena was his immediate prewar home, he preferred St. Louis County.

The poignancy of the Grant story emerges in Grant's second loss of White Haven near the close of his life, when a Wall Street swindle forced him to give up everything. Since then, White Haven has had a checkered career, and I still remember my own surprise in 1965 to discover that the house was still standing and to learn that it was lovingly maintained with due regard for historic authenticity by the Wenzlick family. Delbert Wenzlick told me that he had deliberately avoided publicity in the years following his occupation of White Haven; after all, it was a family home to him, not an historic landmark. Yet he never neglected its historic heritage while making arrangements for modern living.

Because of this desire for privacy, White Haven received little attention in St. Louis prior to recent years, and the development of local support for its preservation was frustratingly slow. The large membership of the local White Haven support group now attests to how much momentum this effort has acquired. In the future, St. Louisans must pay attention to White Haven as the most important historic building within a one hundred mile radius.

On a national level, White Haven remains something of a secret treasure, although it should not be. No house that Grant ever lived in possesses as much historic resonance as White Haven. After all, everyone has to be born somewhere, everyone needs a roof over his head later in life, but Grant's choice of the White Haven estate as a residence tells even the most casual visiter something about the career of this unmilitary general and unpolitical president. In essence, it is already a National Historic Site, lacking only official recognition as such.

Sincerely,

JOHN Y. SIMON.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. KERRY, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. GARN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. DOLE, Mr. COATS, and Mr. MACK):

S.J. Res. 72. Joint resolution to designate the period commencing May 7, 1989, and ending May 13, 1989, as "National Correctional Officers Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CORRECTIONAL OFFICERS WEEK

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution designating the week of May 7, 1989, as "National Correctional Officers Week."

This resolution is similar to legislation I have sponsored in the last two Congresses and serves to honor our correctional officers around the country for their tireless commitment of staffing the nation's correctional facilities.

Our Nation's correctional officers work under highly stressful conditions, where exposure to risky or dangerous situations is a daily part of their jobs. Presently, these officers are responsible for the safety and welfare of over 600,000 inmates in the country, and are also integral to the protection of surrounding communities.

I feel strongly that National Correctional Officers Week is a way to show our support for these dedicated men and women. I urge my colleagues to support and to cosponsor this resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD directly following my remarks. Thank you.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 72

Whereas American correctional officers who work in our jails and prisons are currently responsible for the containment and control of over six hundred thousand prisoners;

Whereas correctional officers must protect inmates from violence while encouraging them to develop skills and attitudes that can help them become productive members of society following their release;

Whereas the morale of correctional officers is affected by many factors, and the public perception of the role of correctional officers is more often based upon dramatization rather than factual review;

Whereas good job performance requires correctional officers to absorb the adverse attitudes present in confinement while maintaining themselves as professionals in order to have their actions appreciated and accepted by the public at large;

Whereas correctional officers had been similarly honored by many States and localities;

Whereas correctional officers had been similarly honored by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled in 1984, 1985, and 1987; and

Whereas the attitude and morale of correctional officers is a matter worthy of serious congressional attention: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the period commencing May 7, 1979, and ending May 13, 1989, hereby is designated "National Correctional Officers Week" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. WALLOP (for himself and Mr. BOSCHWITZ) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 17

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that each committee of the Congress that reports legislation that requires employers to provide new employee benefits shall secure an objective analysis of the impact of the legislation on employment and international competitiveness and include an analysis of the impact in the report of the committee on the legislation.

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I rise to submit a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that committees reporting legislation that would require employers to provide new employee benefits must secure an objective analysis of the impact that legislation will have on employment and international competitiveness. These analyses would be included in the committee's report on the legislation.

The purpose of this concurrent resolution is to give us the opportunity to consider the employment and competitive impacts of proposed increases in labor costs when bills requiring new employee benefits are reported to the floor of both Chambers. Given the broad array of bills which mandate new benefits such as the Family and Medical Leave Act, and mandated health benefits which have been introduced in this Congress, it is vital that we have a chance to assess the impact of these bills on employment and competitiveness, particularly as regards small business. I regret that we didn't have this information before us when we were debating the high risk disease notification legislation during the last Congress.

While I am not arguing with the perceived intentions of family and medical leave and mandated health benefits, my major concern is the potential cost of these bills to employers. Under this legislation, employees would have a right to leave under certain circumstances without pay, but the employer would suffer through the trials and tribulations of having to train another employee to replace that person temporarily. Training new employees costs time and money. Everyone knows that increases in employer costs result in lower employment. At a time when our unemployment rate is the lowest it has been in decades, that is not something we want to see as a result of legislation we enact that doesn't cost the Federal Government anything but could cost small businesses a great deal.

Recent estimates show that the cost of this mandated benefit to employers having 20 or more workers would be approximately $194 million annually. Currently, employers are voluntarily spending an average of 39.3 percent of their payroll for benefits, or $10,283 per year per employee. Voluntary annual expenditures by employers on benefits have risen from $190 billion in 1973 to $742 billion in 1986. I think the small businesses of our Nation can ill afford this additional cost at a time when we are attempting to foster their growth and make them more competitive.

The purpose of my resolution is to see to it that we have an opportunity to review the ramifications of this type of legislation before it becomes law. I believe this should become an essential focus of our legislative process. Small business is the backbone of our Nation's economy and they are extremely sensitive not only to benefit mandates—indeed many states already have them—but to increases in labor costs which in turn affect their ability to compete in today's market.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this concurrent resolution so that we might have a better opportunity to assess the impact of mandated benefits on our Nation's economy.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 75—RELATING TO PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS RIGHTS FOR PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEE'S

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 75

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of rule XXXI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by—

(1) inserting "(a)" after "1."; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b) Any individual nominated by the President to be the principal officer of an Executive Department shall be entitled to the following procedural due process rights during the consideration of such nominee by a committee:

"(1) All witnesses before the committee shall be sworn and subject to cross examination by the nominee or counsel for the nominee.

"(2) The nominee may call before the committee and examine (through counsel if the nominee requests) any witness presenting evidence relevant to the nomination.

"(3) The committee may not consider or make part of the record any evidence based upon nonattributed hearsay or information received from any unidentified or unavailable witness.

"(4) Notwithstanding paragraph 5(b) of rule XXVI, all meetings of the committee shall be open unless matters to be discussed or testimony to be taken at a meeting will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 76—COMMENDING CHARLES H. PRICE

Mr. BOND (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DANFORTH, and Mrs. KASSEBAUM) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 76

Whereas Charles Price has faithfully served the United States as America's senior representative to the Kingdom of Belgium, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for almost eight years; and

Whereas through his diplomacy, Mr. Price contributed significantly to the continuing good relations between the United States and these countries; and

Whereas in that time he has forcefully and effectively promoted the policies of the United States Government; and

Whereas in every aspect of his work he has distinguished himself as an individual of the highest competence, integrity and moral standing, and has conducted himself with the utmost courage and poise; and

Whereas Mr. Price is now retiring from his position as Ambassador to the Court of St. James's: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the 101st Congress commend Ambassador Charles H. Price II for his outstanding service and dedication to the Government and the people of the United States of America.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on 9:30 a.m., March 6, 1989. Hearing, to receive testimony on S. 406, a bill to authorize competitive oil and gas leasing and development on the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in a manner consistent with protection of the environment, and for other purposes; and three amendments to the bill, numbers 3, 4, and 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs would like to request unanimous consent to hold a hearing on the veterans' program budget on Monday, March 6, 1989, at 12:30 p.m., in SR-418.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON STRATEGIC FORCES AND NUCLEAR DETERRENCE

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Strategic Forces and Nuclear Deterrence of the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet on Monday, March 6, 1989, at 2 p.m., in closed session to receive testimony on Defense Nuclear Agency's nuclear weapons effects testing in review of the fiscal years 1990 and 1991 defense authorization request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

PAT PATTERSON

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, many Senators on the Agriculture Committee know Pat Patterson, a very good friend of this Senator, and a dedicated, hard working farmer from North Danville, VT.

There are times our committee gets bogged down in USDA directives and regulations and the bureaucratic maze that our lawyers create, and then collect exorbitant fees to guide us through.

When times call for good sense rather than more paper work, I get on the phone to Vermont and ask Pat if he has a few minutes to advise the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Pat and his family milk 100 cows twice a day on his farm, and he still finds time to serve as president of the Cabot Farmers' Cooperative Creamery, and other committees and corporations that are related to the dairy industry.

Despite all these activities, Pat always finds time to help me with dairy issues that only a lifetime on the farm can teach you.

And he has come to Washington on occasion to share that knowledge at hearings before the entire committee. The Senators have a great deal of respect for his views on the future of dairy farming in New England, and often ask me to invite him back.

But Pat is too busy keeping his farm going to spend all his time helping out the committee, or its chairman, understand in simple language what today's farmer is up against.

Today, farmers like Pat not only produce milk, but they must become active in the marketing and pricing of their product to survive.

The complex life of a modern day dairy farmer like Pat Patterson was captured in an article in the Boston Globe of February 26, 1989, written by Douglas Wilhelm.

I am having copies made for all the members of my committee, Mr. President, but would ask that the article be reprinted in its entirety so that other Senators, especially those from farm States, can get a better appreciation of what Pat Patterson means to the State of Vermont, and to me personally.

The article follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Feb. 26, 1989]

COWS TO MILK, COMMITTEES TO MEET—MODERN FARMER'S LIFE IS NO LONGER SIMPLE

(By Douglas Wilhelm)

DANVILLE, VT.—No matter how you approach Lloyd Patterson's dairy farm, you've got to go the last several miles on back roads. It's a beautiful drive, up and over the hills that rise around North Danville village. Patterson's place is on a crest, where the open-pastured view of northeastern Vermont drops away in nearly every direction. You can think this is one place where life must be fairly simple—where a farmer just stays, and farms.

No.

With his family, Patterson, known as Pat, milks 100 cows twice a day. He is also a director, treasurer, board chairman, national delegate to or president of eight organizations that process milk, market milk products, promote milk products, lobby for dairy farmers or work on farm pricing, farm economics or the science of breeding cows.

The broad-faced farmer greeted a visitor cordially at a table in his den. He was dressed in a plaid shirt, work pants and blue suspenders. He paid close attention and was very careful with his words. His son Roy was in and out with blackened hands, trying to fix a blocked fuel filter on a tractor outside. There is always something, the farmer said.

"I probably won't say this right. I probably can't even express how I feel," Patterson said. "But I think it's very necessary that every farmer understand the complexities. . . . It's pretty easy to sit back at home and say, . . . 'It should be this way'—but if you dig into it a little bit, there's always a reason why the obvious solution isn't obtainable."

Many dairy farmers just produce milk and ship it. Patterson did that for 10 years, until 1960, when he was asked onto the board of Cabot Farmers' Cooperative Creamery. He has been Cabot's president or chairman since 1965.

He also is milk promotion director, executive committeeman and treasurer of Milk Promotion Services, Inc., delegate to United Dairy Industry Association, president of a group of dairy cooperatives that works on economic issues, president of the Legislative Committee of Northeast Cooperatives, treasurer of the Regional Cooperative Marketing Association, director of National Milk Producers Federation, and director of Eastern Artificial Insemination Corp.

"I never volunteered for anything," the farmer said.

All this takes, by his estimate, 10 days a month, and "It's almost safe to say 10 nights a month, too."

"Certainly farms are having problems today," he said. "We've had them in the past, and we're going to have them in the future. But I still believe it's a pretty good life. . . . Polly and I started 38 years ago with nothing. We still got it, only we got more of it."

Pat Patterson stood up and shook the visitor's hand.

"I do have kind of a busy afternoon planned," he said.—Douglas Wilhelm●

TRIBUTE TO MARGARET M. KEANE

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to Margaret M. Keane, the grand marshal of the Bergen County St. Patrick's Day Parade. She is the first woman to be named grand marshal of the parade which has been sponsored by the Bergen County Council of Irish Associations for the past 8 years. This year the parade will be held Sunday, March 12 in Bergenfield.

Mrs. Keane has been a leader in the local Irish community for 19 years. Her parents were originally from County Sligo, Ireland. In 1969, her family moved to Dumont, NJ. She has been active in local Irish organizations ever since. Mrs. Keane was a member of the Gaelic League Choir and has organized many fund-raising dances for needy Irish-American families.

A retired nurse and mother of four, Mrs. Keane has brought her enthusiasm and leadership to many local Irish organizations. I applaud Mrs. Keane for her enthusiasm and spirit which help keep Irish traditions alive, and I congratulate her for unanimously being elected grand marshal of the Bergen County St. Patrick's Parade.●

"THE UNFINISHED AGENDA OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITY": AN ADDRESS BY MICHAEL A. PELAVIN, CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL JEWISH COMMUNITY RELATIONS ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council [NJCRAC] held its plenary session in Washington, DC, during the Presidents' Day weekend. The distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] and the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], delivered thoughtful addresses at the plenum's keynote session.

In February 1944, during the darkest days of the Second World War, four national Jewish agencies and 14 local community relations councils came together to found the NJCRAC. The new body was charged with the coordination of policy and planning for the Jewish community.

The NJCRAC brought together for the first time both national agencies and local Jewish community relations boards, with equal status given to all its member agencies. This new organization provided the vehicle for community agencies to influence national issues by creating an arena for national and local organizations to exchange views and forge consensus.

In the intervening 45 years, the NJCRAC partnership has grown to 114 local and 11 national constituent members representing over 4½ million American Jews.

I would like to call the Senate's attention to a most thoughtful address delivered by Michael A. Pelavin, chairman of the NJCRAC, at this year's closing plenum luncheon. Mr. President, I ask that the full text of Mr. Pelavin's address, entitled "To Build a Better America: The Unfinished Agenda of the Jewish Community" be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

The address follows:

TO BUILD A BETTER AMERICA; THE UNFINISHED AGENDA OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITY

(Address by Michael A. Pelavin)

In his moving acceptance speech at the Republican National Convention last August, George Bush told us that he's a quiet man, but "one who hears the quiet people others don't." What a wonderful aspiration for a President! And how difficult a task!

I want to take a moment at the outset of my remarks to help give voice to some of those quiet people, to some of our fellow citizens whose voices are not being heard.

Listen to the voice of Shamal Jackson who lived only eight months. By the time he died in New York City from low birth weight, poor nutrition, and viral infection, Shamal had never slept in an apartment or house. He had slept in shelters with strangers, in hospitals, in welfare hotels, in the welfare office and in subways which he and his mother rode late at night when there was no place else to go.

Listen to the voice of Terri from Redwood City, California. The mother of two, Terri has donated blood to get a little extra money to buy food for her children. Without a job or an apartment, Terri once went four days without food while searching for shelter for herself and her children.

Hear the voice of Betty Stevens, an only child, solely responsible for her chronically-ill elderly parents. Ms. Stevens cared for her mother and father for eight years until their deteriorating conditions forced her to place them in a nursing home. As the expenses continued to mount, Ms. Stevens had no choice but to sell her parents' home of 51 years to meet these costs. "To find myself hoping they do not survive beyond the time their funds can cover their expenses is devastating."

Listen also to the voice of Phillip Williams, a Jewish man, homeless, living on the streets of Baltimore. "Sometimes," he says, "I feel like the Jewish community of this city is willing to pump money for causes such as the homeless, and that's fine. But," Mr. Williams asks, "how many have been willing to take the time to know anyone who is homeless?"

These are not isolated stories. They are simply four voices, voices which need to be heard. And if we—the Jewish Community Relations field—do not hear them, who will? If we, in effect, will not be their voice, who will?

II

The challenge facing the community relations field today—and tomorrow—is to discover whether we as a community are ready once again to assume the responsibility for arousing what is best in the American people: their compassion, their understanding, their commitment to justice and equality for all people. Are we ready to renew America's commitment to eliminating the inequities that still exist in this land of plenty?

There is still a domestic community relations agenda, a pressing, demanding, seemingly intractable series of issues and claims that confront our nation—and our own community—with its most serious challenge. Crucial battles for legal equality have been won, but the facts of social inequality remain.

With all the hoop-la about America's "economic recovery," the gap between rich and poor is now wider than at any time since the Census Bureau began collecting such data. The United States is increasingly becoming two societies—one rich, one poor. What does that say for our hopes about the health of American democracy? Nearly 32,000,000 Americans live at or near the poverty line. More than 20% of all children, and half of all black and Hispanic youngsters—some 13,000,000 young people—live in poverty. Two to 3,000,000 Americans are homeless altogether. Thirty-seven million Americans have no health insurance. More than half the babies born to teenagers are born out of wedlock. Seventeen percent of white families and 56% of black families are headed by single women.

Last month, the U.S. Conference of Mayors released the findings of a study on hunger and homelessness in 27 American cities. Among its conclusions, the report found that, requests for emergency food assistance increased in nearly 90% of the survey cities, by an average of about 20%. More than three out of five persons seeking emergency food assistance in the survey cities are members of families—both children and parents.

With the decline in federally-assisted housing programs, none of the survey cities expect to meet the housing needs of low income households for the foreseeable future. Shelters in two out of three of the survey cities must turn away homeless families because of lack of resources. In nearly three-fourths of these cities, emergency shelters must turn away other homeless people because of lack of resources.

And the plague of drugs, with attendant crime and other social pathologies, bespeaks the alienation, anger, and despair that coldly embrace growing numbers of the so-called underclass. Do we not have an obligation to help these men, women and children—our fellow Americans—overcome this legacy of need and achieve self-sufficiency?

The Jewish community itself is not immune from serious domestic problems. Jews are threatened with falling through gaping holes in the "safety net." The city of Chicago has identified 36,000 Jews as "economically vulnerable." Philadelphia's population study found over 1,000 Jewish households receiving some form or another of public assistance. The median age of the Jewish community—at 39, about 20% higher than society at large—suggests that we need to confront the frightfully costly problem of long-term home and health care for the elderly. It is estimated that the cost of keeping an individual in a nursing home in America is approaching $30,000 a year. How many among us can afford to care for our parents at that price? Yet who among us is prepared to see our parents not receive the best possible care regardless of price?

Recent studies reveal that the Jewish community shares with society at large growing instances of drug abuse, child abuse, and developmental disabilities. And CJF reports that federal cutbacks in meeting a variety of direct needs has led many federations to respond by restoring cash assistance lines to their budgets. In meeting these needs, however, other requests for communal support must go unheeded.

III

The American Jewish Community has always been in the forefront of the struggle for social justice. It is not hubris on our part to recall the role of the Jewish community relations field as the conscience of two communities—our own and the broader one in which we live. But why is the Jewish community there? Why has the Jewish community continued to be counted in that fight?

Answers to these questions are as many and varied as the people in this room today. But I am sure that we would agree to certain things. First, about history. Our immigrant forebears found in America not a golden land, but a golden opportunity. In America, it seemed, everyone was from somewhere else. The land bubbled with excitement and possibility. With faith in oneself, one might succeed.

I am a product of that migration. My father came to this country in 1922 from White Russia; my mother arrived from Budapest in 1912. One of my grandfathers peddled milk from a horse-drawn wagon, and my father sold newspapers in his effort to help the family. By the time they died, their families had joined them, their children were educated, and the dreams that they had shaped for themselves here in America had come into being and their hopes were fulfilled.

But my parents and yours brought something else, seeds that took root in American ground though not native to it: our collective Jewish consciousness—a history and an ethic—that to this day enables us to understand what is truly important to our security, to our sense of self and our sense of place. We have been imprinted with the mark of history. We are heirs of the Holocaust, the persecuted of the pogroms, the ancient scapegoats of alien lands. The tragedies and glories of our past unite us, and with the creation of the State of Israel we know that we never again shall depend on the kindness of strangers to secure our future, for we now have our own land. And because Israel plays that role for us, we will never compromise on the central issue of her right to exist as a creative, viable, democratic society and on her unsparing efforts to apply her strength in the search for a just and enduring peace.

Strengthened by our hopes for America and tempered by the lessons of our group history, the Jewish community has largely succeeded in this country. Among all American religious groups, Jews have the highest level of family income and educational attainment. We are leaders in the learned professions, academic, and the arts. We are prominent in public affairs.

Our material success and our political behavior are puzzling to many. Why is it, we are asked, that Jews vote more like disadvantaged minorities than like our socio-economic peers? Some, including some Jews, wonder if Jewish interest would not be better served if we "voted our pocketbooks."

I disagree. Such a view is shortsighted; it misreads our understanding of what is required to assure our continuing security in American society. When Ronald Reagan asked and George Bush echoed, "Are you better off today than you were eight years ago," the Jewish community answered not individually but collectively. While many of us may indeed be better off financially today than in 1980, we dispute the premise of the question. We ask instead, "What is the state of America today as compared to eight years ago? What assistance has been offered to the poor, the homeless and the unemployed among us? What is being done to meet the needs of the vast majority of American citizens in health care, child care, and housing?"

It ought not be surprising that a community whose central questions are these should continue to vote for candidates who share its view that assisting the needy is a principal function of government. We vote not out of a personal history stretching back ten or twenty years, but out of 2,000 years of Jewish experience which has ingrained in us an understanding that conditions threatening to the fundamental right of any individual in society jeopardize the rights of all. We remember the words of Rabbi Stephen Wise, who taught us that "only in a land where the rights of all are secure are the rights of Jews secure." And we remember that the freedoms embodied in the Bill of Rights—of speech, assembly, press, worship, and the right to petition the government—must always be protected, for they are the very bedrock of the society in which we have flourished.

We have consistently applied these principles in our practice. Early on, the Jewish community understood that coalition building is the soundest strategy for a minority—any minority, including our own—to achieve its political objectives. With workers from around the world, our forebears struggled with labor unions to bring justice and equity to the work place. With blacks in Alabama, grape growers in California, wherever injustice cried out for witness, the Jewish community stood shoulder to shoulder with other "weak clients" seeking redress of grievances. And from these common, pragmatic efforts came the relationships that have been translated not only into a shared, general vision of America but also into broad support for our particular concerns: Israel's survival and the rights of Soviet Jews to rejoin their people in freedom.

We acknowledged that commitment to common cause nearly fifty years ago in creating NJCRAC as the institutional framework for arriving at and articulating our communal goals and pursuing them on behalf of the common good. The NJCRAC process, I believe, has the flexibility and dynamism to shape the response of the Jewish community relations field to our new challenges. Polls tell us that a vast majority of Jews share the outlook and positions of NJCRAC as reflected in the Joint Program Plan. Too many of these Jews, however, are unindentified with the community. Many are like I was before my involvement in my local federation, a young lawyer involved in organizations like the ACLU who did not fully realize that these efforts on behalf of the broader community actually reflected a Jewish sensibility. The field needs to consciously reach out to these young men and women, recognizing the Jewish community relations provides an important, yet underutilized channel for bringing people into the Jewish community.

Secondly, we must acknowledge that our strategic practice has frequently fallen short of our rhetoric. How many communities are actively, consciously involved in coalition-building? Are we uncovering common agendas with the Blacks, Hispanics, and Asian Americans who are our neighbors and organizing effective coalitions to achieve our shared goals. The automatic liberal coalition of the thirties, forties, fifties, and sixties no longer exists. The challenge for us, then is to construct functional coalitions of limited duration, designed to achieve specific goals. We see such coalitions coming together frequently in Washington, suggesting models that can be utilized by the field at the local level.

Thirdly, we must acknowledge our own shortcomings. How many of our communities actually confront issues of domestic concern on a day-to-day priority basis? In my view, too many of us have bought the argument that the Jewish community simply cannot afford the resources required to do community relations well. Part of the task ahead is to make it clear that active involvement in the public affairs agenda is a central Jewish enterprise—it protects and preserves American democracy and it builds active strongly-identified Jews. If for no other reason, community relations should be seen as a major community priority.

The JTA Community News Reporter for December 9, 1988 tells of the permanent residence facility operating in Adas Israel Congregation here in Washington, D.C. Housing five women between the ages of 30 and 50, the project was conceived by the synagogue as a model effort to involve the religious community in finding a permanent answer to the problem of homelessness. According to the synagogue's social action chairman, the "potential for expansion is largely in getting other congregations and other organizations to pursue similar programs." The facility is called the Anne Frank House, a name that evokes in us all the realization that the struggle for justice is an unceasing one whose outcome is by no means assured.

This striking example of Jewish involvement in the problem of homelessness stands in sharp contrast to the general absence of such creative programming in the community. To me, it only underscores the existing evidence that we have neglected our relationships. Growing public recognition of tension between Jews and blacks, the pending judicial assault on the principle of reproductive choice embodied in the Supreme Court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade, the spectacle of pro-Israel supporters heckled and booed at the Democratic National Convention are all stark reminders that the work of building bridges to other groups in society must be an ongoing enterprise within the field of Jewish community relations. If we do not involve ourselves in the full range of American life, is it likely that other Americans will care about what is important to us? If we do not fight against the injustices affecting others, will they fight the injustices affecting us? While ongoing relationships are no guarantee that our viewpoint will prevail, the absence of strong bridges is a guarantee that our position will be vulnerable.

IV

Hubert Humphrey, certainly an ally whose friendship, loyalty and compassion are revered by everyone in this room, once said that the moral test of a society is how it treats those at the dawn of life, children who are helpless; those in the midday, the healthy who need employment and housing; and those within the shadows, the handicapped, the needy, the other helpless. I would add that the Jewish community ought to be in the forefront of efforts to devise and enact comprehensive programs to break the cycle of generational poverty.

How do we do that? Emergency housing and food programs must be fully funded, not cut; rent subsidies must be restored, not phased out; the minimum wage must be increased; quality child care must be available to all Americans; sound family policy must include the right of people to care for newborn or ill children and dependent elderly parents without risk of job loss; Americans must be able to aspire to home ownership, quality education, a rewarding job, affordable health care. In short, the American dream must be restored as a reality to each American household. And each American must have a household in which to cherish that dream.

Yet these goals cost money, and our country faces a severe deficit. How do we balance the two? I would suggest to you that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is not social policy. While we must recognize that federal deficits are a serious problem, spending cuts in the domestic arena are not the only way to reduce those deficits. There are other options. We can—read my lips!—raise revenue. Opinion polls show that a majority of Americans not only believe that President Bush and the Congress will have to raise taxes, but they also are not averse to tax increases to cope with the deficit. And of course, I believe that the defense budget should be scrutinized with the same rigor with which the domestic budget has been pared. Whatever approach ultimately followed, the Jewish community relations field has an obligation to debate the issues—as we have at this plenum—and insist that the government address these problems, rather than hide behind ideology masquerading as economic policy.

What is Jewish about that debate and that agenda, we are asked? Everything. As Leonard Fein observes in his recent book, "Where Are We?" public affairs allows the Jewish community to enact our particular ethical values. It requires us to test the prophetic vision of our faith against the facts of our society's shortcomings. Responding to injustice is central to our integrity as a people. By fighting for justice we can reaffirm our past and redeem our future. Separation of church and state is a justice and a Jewish issue. Civil rights is a justice issue and Jewish issue. Persecution of blacks in South Africa is a justice issue and a Jewish issue. The rights of children, the needs of the elderly, the survival of our cities and farms, these are all justice issues. They must all be Jewish issues as well. If we want pluralism in our society, then we cannot be singular in our concerns.

At the end of the day after all is said and done, that is at the heart of Jewish community relations. That is what Jewish community relations should be saying clearly and unequivocally. If it cannot say at least that much, then I fear it has nothing Jewish to say at all, because our ethical and moral credo tells us that we must be involved in all these issues as Jews and as Americans. That is our obligation.

Remaining engaged in the affairs of our community is a community relations imperative. As Americans and as Jews, we have no moral or pragmatic choice but to move ahead and re-invest our community with the impulse to confront the incomplete domestic agenda. The need to do so is rooted not only in altruism but also in the knowledge that what is good for America is good for the Jewish community and that the strength of the Jewish community and its ability to survive in freedom bears a direct relationship to the quality of life of those around us. But just as the Jewish community has been concerned for the health of American democracy, the health of American democracy allows us to be concerned about the Jewish community. There is a symbiotic relationship between our community and our country that assures the well-being of each.

Thus, the mission of the community relations field—to safeguard the rights of Jews and assure the strength of American democracy—supports our resolve to work to build a better and more just America. Drawing upon the words of our sages, we may not complete the work, but we may not desist from the effort.●

COMMENDING CHARLES H. PRICE II

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send the enclosed resolution to the desk on behalf of Senators BOND, DOLE, DANFORTH, KASSEBAUM, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 76) commending Charles H. Price II.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 76

Whereas Charles Price has faithfully served the United States as America's senior representative to the Kingdom of Belgium, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for almost eight years; and

Whereas through his diplomacy, Mr. Price contributed significantly to the continuing good relations between the United States and these countries; and

Whereas in that time he has forcefully and effectively promoted the policies of the United States Government; and

Whereas in every aspect of his work he has distinguished himself as an individual of the highest competence, integrity and moral standing, and has conducted himself with the utmost courage and poise; and

Whereas Mr. Price is now retiring from his position as Ambassador to the Court of St. James's: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the 101st Congress commend Ambassador Charles H. Price II for his outstanding service and dedication to the Government and the people of the United States of America.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR STAR PRINT—S. 401

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 401, a bill to exclude the Social Security trust funds from deficit calculations, be star printed to reflect the changes I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPLY TO JUDGE HASTINGS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has.

The Chair submits to the Senate for printing in the Senate Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the reply of Judge Hastings to the response by the managers of the House of Representatives to motions to dismiss several of the articles of impeachment against Judge Hastings, which reply was received by the Secretary of the Senate on March 6, 1989.

The reply follows:

TERENCE J. ANDERSON,
THE UNIVERSITY OF MIAMI SCHOOL OF LAW,
Coral Gables, FL, March 3, 1989.

Hon. WALTER STEWART,
Secretary of the Senate, of the United States, the Capitol, S-208, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. STEWART: I enclose an executed original of Judge Hastings' Reply to the Responses of the House of Representatives to Respondent's Motions To Dismiss Articles I Through XV and Article XVII for the Senate's records. Copies have been previously transmitted by telefacsimile to Senate Legal Counsel. Copies are being dispatched with this letter to the Managers for the House of Representatives and their staff.

Sincerely,

TERENCE J. ANDERSON.

[In the Senate of the United States Sitting for the Trial of an Impeachment]

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, PLAINTIFF, V. THE HONORABLE ALCEE L. HASTINGS, A JUDGE OF THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA, RESPONDENT

JUDGE HASTING'S REPLY TO THE RESPONSES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO RESPONDENT'S MOTIONS TO DISMISS ARTICLES I THROUGH XV AND ARTICLE XVII

The House asks the Senate to conduct a trial in this case that would be without precedent in this or any nation in the common law world. Never before has impeachment been used to re-examine issues that had been determined by a jury in favor of the accused. We submit that the House's unprecedented request is unjust and unjustified. We ask that the Senate reject it.

Seven years ago, the government accused the respondent of conspiring to solicit a bribe. The government, not the respondent, chose the forum where the accusation would be tried. The government, not the respondent, decided that portions of the available evidence should be presented to persuade the jury of respondent's guilt. Respondent confronted the government and its evidence in the forum chosen by his accusers. Respondent took the stand. He testified, and he was cross-examined fully.

The government claimed that respondent's testimony was false and produced so much additional evidence as it thought bore upon that point. The government submitted its accusations to the jurors. Respondent, as required, committed his honor and fate to their discretion. Respondent prevailed. The jury rejected the accusations decisively.[1]

Six years after the fact, the House asks the Senate to hold that those proceedings counted for nought. The House says the Senate should not be concerned because there is no difference between an acquittal and a conviction. We say the House is wrong. The House says the Senate should not give weight or deference to the jury's verdict. We say the House is wrong. The House says the Senate should not consider facts such as the death of witnesses or the destruction of records and memories in deciding whether it can conduct a trial that is fair to the respondent. We say the House is wrong. The House says it should not matter that the government has expended more than two million dollars in re-examining the evidence against the accused without providing any money to enable the respondent to gather or preserve evidence for his defense. We say the House is wrong. The House says it should not matter that the six years of post-acquittal investigations produced no evidence that was not available to the prosecutors at the first trial. We say the House is wrong.

We say the House is wrong in principle. We say the Senate should be concerned, very much concerned. We say the Senate should rebuff the House's unprecedented attempt to impeach a jury's verdict of acquittal and impose the burdens of a second trial on the Senate and the respondent six years after the fact in the circumstances present here. We submit this reply so the Senate may fully appreciate the wrongness of the views the House presses upon it.

The Senate must resolve two questions:

1. What deference should the Senate give the jury's verdict acquitting the respondent of the accusations realleged in the challenged articles of impeachment?

2. Is it feasible, at this late date, that a trial on the merits could satisfy the essential requirements of fairness to the respondent?

The House contends that there is no difference between an acquittal and a conviction and that the Constitution requires that the Senate give little or no weight to the jury's verdict rejecting the accusations it renews here. Respondent contends that a final determination made by a constitutional body in a coordinate branch of government is entitled to great deference by officers in all three branches. In this view, the Senate can properly decline to assume the burden of redetermining issues that have been determined by a jury in favor of the accused, and the Senate should invariably decline that burden unless confronted with subsequently discovered "smoking gun" evidence or other comparably exceptional circumstances. We submit that, if there are circumstances that might justify the Senate's undertaking such a second trial, they are not present in this case.

The House contends that the Senate may not properly consider whether the passage of time has created a situation that may make it impracticable and probably impossible for the Senate to conduct a second trial on the merits that comports with the requirements of fundamental fairness. In our view, this must be wrong. The Senate can and must consider the general requirements of fundamental fairness the Constitution established to protect the rights of all accused citizens. We submit that the passage of time has created circumstances in which it is no longer feasible for the Senate to conduct a trial that comports with those requirements in this case. Too many witnesses have died and too many records have been destroyed. What remains is only the testimony of witnesses whose testimony has been too often rehearsed or witnesses whose recollection must necessarily have dimmed beyond repair.

The House does not indicate what weight, if any, the Senate should give the special requirements of secure tenure and compensation that the Constitution established to protect the necessary independence of every judge appointed to exercise the federal judicial power. In our view, that is an omission the Senate may not properly overlook. That omission bears upon the House's further contention that the Senate would establish a troubling precedent if it granted these motions to dismiss. That contention ignores the fact that the questions presented by these motions are related. In our view, the fact that the accused is an Article III judge and the combination of extraordinary circumstances present in this case make it clear that the Senate may properly dismiss these articles without any concern that the precedent established would restrict the House in bringing proper cases of impeachement in the future.

The circumstances that support this view are far more extensive than the House has acknowledged. It is not just the fact that a jury rejected the accusations the House asks the Senate to retry. It is also the fact (i) that there is no new evidence that was not available to the prosecutors at the time of trial, (ii) that the House's case remains today as the prosecutor's case was then—circumstantial, and (iii) that a second trial would merely afford the House a chance to second-guess the strategy the prosecutors adopted and required the respondent to confront before the jury. It is not just the fact that more than seven years have passed since the principal accusation was first made and more than six since the challenged accusations were rejected by a jury. It is also the fact that witnesses have died, records have been lost and destroyed, and recollections have become impaired or diminished beyond repair. It is not just the fact that the six years of post-acquittal investigations have undermined the security and diminished the compensation of the respondent. It is also the fact that his accusers have enjoyed substantially unlimited resources to pursue their post-acquittal investigations while no resources have been made available to enable the judge to pursue the additional post-acquittal investigations that would have been necessary to enable him to gather and preserve the additional evidence necessary for a fair defense.

We submit that the Senate should dismiss the challenged articles to assure that these circumstances can never again come before it in a case of impeachment. The precedent established would be narrow and healthy and would not prevent the House from initiating and the Senate from considering any case in which the circumstances warranted a determination on the merits.

B.

The tortured analysis of the framers' intent and contemporary constitutional doctrine developed by the House ignores the basic plan the framers intended and the subsequent developments that have made it necessary for the Senate to decide the questions presented here. The founding fathers clearly did not envisage that judges might be criminally prosecuted by the executive and tried in the courts before they had been impeached by the House and tried by the Senate. The Constitution and its history clearly support the view that the framers saw impeachment proceedings as being, in most important respects, criminal in nature. For that reason, the framers included explicit exceptions to accommodate the differences in procedure they foresaw as necessary.

They foresaw the potential need for and explicitly provided an exception that authorized a second trial before the courts on accusations that had resulted in a convic- tion by the Senate. By implication, they excluded the possibility of a second prosecution and trial before the courts after an acquittal by the Senate in case of impeachment. Indeed, could anyone seriously contend that a judge who had been acquitted by the Senate would remain liable to prosecution by the executive and trial by the courts on the very accusations that the Senate had rejected?

The framers did not envisage the day when the judicial business would require the service of more than 700 federal judges. This unanticipated circumstance has established the conditions under which criminal prosecution by the executive and trial before the courts have been permitted to precede impeachment by the House and trial before the Senate. That development has undermined, in some degree, the protections accorded judges. Far from warranting further departures from the principles the framers established, however, that development has enhanced the need for their careful application.

The sequence of the proceedings should not affect the principles or their application. A conviction in either forum justifies and may require a second trial in the other. It was necessary that the Senate independently re-examine the accusations and evidence after Judge Claiborne had been tried and convicted in the courts in order to provide him with the protections the framers intended when they authorized a second trial for those convicted in cases of impeachment. Moreover, the circumstances that have led to the adoption of a sequence that differs from that envisaged by the framers has enhanced the need for independent examination by the House and the Senate to assure that executive and judicial officers have not exercised their discretionary powers improperly to undermine the security of a disfavored judge. It is also clear that both the House and Senate accorded the jury's verdict considerable weight in the Claiborne impeachment.

An acquittal in either forum is entitled great respect in the other, and the Senate should accord a judgment of acquittal in the courts the same deference it would expect the courts to accord a judgment of acquittal by the Senate. It is a grave matter to go behind the verdict of a jury. It undermines the constitutional position of the jury in our system of government. It violates, in our view, and undermines, in any view, fundamental protections guaranteed every accused under our constitutional plan. When the accused is a judge, it undermines the protections conferred to assure the people an independent judiciary. The Senate may leave for another day a determination whether there are any circumstances that would justify the Senate in taking such a course, for surely there are no circumstances that would warrant such a departure from established principal in this case.[2]

C.

The House's analysis also fails to take account of the changed situation that the Senate must confront. The fact that criminal prosecutions by the executive and trials by the court have been permitted to precede impeachment by the House and trial by the Senate reflects a further point. The Senate can no longer devote the time necessary to conduct extended trials with all the guarantees and procedures necessary to assure that the trial is fair to the accused and that the Senate can "preserve unawed and uninfluenced the necessary impartiality between an individual accused and the representatives of the people, his accusers." [3]

The present case of impeachment illustrates the problems in their most extreme form. It required the undivided and undistracted attention of a judge and twelve jurors for more than two weeks for the trial that was necessary to enable the prosecutors to present so much of the available evidence as they thought necessary and to enable the accused to respond. The House now estimates that it would take take twelve to fifteen full trial days just for it to represent that evidence and such additional evidence as it believes material to the case. Counsel for the accused have estimated that time needed for response cannot be less. If the House inquiry is any guide, the documents submitted will be voluminous.

This is not the kind of enterprise which the Senate should encourage or undertake, absent compelling necessity. Where a jury has unanimously rejected accusations against a judge following a trial that afforded his accusers a full and fair opportunity to present so much of the available evidence as they thought bore upon his guilt, the House should be neither encouraged nor permitted to impose the burdens of a belated second trial on the Senate merely to permit it to have a second chance to see if a more extensive presentation of the same evidence might be marshalled to produce a different result.[4]

The plan envisaged by the farmers has been altered to accommodate the necessites of the present situation. The executive has, de facto, assumed in large measure the House's role of investigating and prosecuting accusations charging a judge with serious offenses. The courts and juries have been, de facto, substituted for the Senate as the adjudicators of a judge's innocence or guilt. Congres has assigned the judiciary the powers necessary to enable it to inquire into lesser charges of misconduct and to investigate and bring to the House's attention serious allegations that the executive may have overlooked or may have determined did not constitute offenses under the criminal laws.

Under this altered plan, the Senate retains an important role that still must tax its capacity. The Senate must conduct the second trial contemplated by Constitution for judges who are convicted in the courts. That trial must be sufficient to enable the Senate to satisfy itself that the judge was not improperly abused in the process. The Senate may yet have to conduct full trials on accusations certified to the House by the judiciary or developed by the House itself that have not previously been submitted to the courts.

The procedures available today establish precautions greater than those contemplated by the framers to assure the responsibility of federal judges. Neither principle nor contemporary need provide any support for the further departure the House seeks in this case of impeachment. Nor do they support the House's view that the Senate should assume burdens greater than those it must execute to serve its intended function.

Principle and common sense suggest that the better practice would be to require that the judiciary, the executive, or the House find other accusations if they believe an acquitted judge has corrupted his office and should be removed. The House has produced one such new accusation in this case, the improper disclosure accusation made in Article XVI.[5] That accusation should suffice to provide it the opportunity it seeks. That accusation, but only that accusation, may properly be tried on the merits, if the House persists in the view that the evidence warrants such further proceedings.

The arguments advanced by the House rest upon a fundamental misconception on the nature of the proceedings. The House contends that the framers intended impeachment proceedings to be purely remedial with none of the characteristics of cases that are criminal in nature. The House's arguments ignore the plain meaning of the language and other established principles of construction. The point is adequately developed in our opening memorandum; the flaws in the House's response may be illustrated here by considering six questions it left unsatisfactorily answered:

1. If the framers intended to create merely a remedial process for the removal of public officers, why did they adopt the label "impeachment," a label that only applied to cases that were viewed as criminal in nature?

2. Why did the framers reject proposals that the standard include "maladministration" and "neglect of duty" and borrow instead the English criminal standard for defining offenses against the state, "Treason, Bribery, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors," if they intended to establish a remedial proceeding that was not to have any of the attributes of proceedings that were criminal in nature?

3. Why did the framers include the exception to the general rule, "the Trial of all Crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by the jury," unless they understood that the general rule would apply to cases of impeachment as well as to other criminal cases in the absence of an exception?

4. If impeachment is merely a remedial proceeding to remove an unfit officer from office, why did the framers confer upon the Senate the discretion to impose the additional sanction of "disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust, or Profit under the United States"—as Hamilton saw it, the "awful discretion . . . to doom . . . to infamy" and the power to sentence the offender "to a perpetual ostracism from the esteem and confidence and honors and enrichments of his country"?

5. If the cases of impeachment were not to be criminal in nature and the sanction of permanent disqualification was not intended as punishment, why did the framers find it necessary to include an express exception to the power that authorizes the President "to grant Reprieves and Pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment"?

6. If cases of impeachment were not to be criminal in nature, why did the framers conclude that an express exception to the general rule was necessary to assure that a "Party convicted [in a case of impeachment] shall nevertheless by liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law"?

The extraordinary nature of the premise the House asks the Senate to accept is also apparent in contemporary practice. For example, where should a lawyer, a judge, or a Senator look for an authoritative definition of a legal term? For almost 100 years, the nigh universal answer has been Black's Law Dictionary. Throughout that period, the definition of "impeachement" has remained essentially unchanged:

"Impeachment. A criminal proceeding against a public officer, before a quasi political court, instituted by a written accusation called "articles of impeachment"; for example, a written accusation by the House of Representatives of the United States to the Senate of the United States against the President, Vice President, or an officer of the United States. Such federal power of impeachment is provided for in Art. II. § 4 of the Constitution. Under Art. I, § 2, cl. 5, the House of Representatives "shall have the sole Power of Impeachment", and under § 3, cl. 6, "The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments".

"Articles of impeachment. The formal written allegation of the causes for an impeachment, answering the same purpose as an indictment in an ordinary criminal proceeding.[6]"

The House concedes that in 1787, "impeachment," as a term describing the procedure for the trial of a public officer, had only one meaning. It does not, however, explain the alchemy by which it contends that the plain meaning of that term was transformed in the minds of the framers or why this transformation has passed unnoticed by those responsible for recording such matters.[7]

This flawed premise has led the House to claim here powers that are truly unprecedented. Never in the history of the common law nations has a constitutionally tenured judge been impeached on accusations after he had been tried and acquitted on the same accusations in a court of law. Indeed, in the only significant modern precedent, the proceedings against Associate Justice Lionel Murphy of the High Court of Australia, the statute authorizing the impeachment inquiry prohibited any further inquiry into the accusations on which Justice Murphy had been criminally tried and acquitted in the courts.[8] That the principle has been observed for almost 300 years without departure should caution the Senate from breaking with that tradition here.

The House does not suggest what protections, if any, must be accorded a respondent in a case of impeachment. This seeming disdain for the rights of the accused also stems from its flawed view that such cases are merely remedial proceedings in which the rights of the accused are matters of small moment. In this, the House must be wrong. Whatever the full scope of the specific protections required, the fact that the proceedings are, in important respects, criminal in nature and that they threaten the accused with loss of fundamental rights establishes that the basic protections mandated by the due process clause must be fully and strictly observed in cases of impeachment.[9]

The House's failure to recognize the extent to which due process requirements must be observed in cases of impeachment extends to its defense of Article XVII. The framers rejected joint address as a method of removal. They insisted instead that the House plead and prove specific offenses. Article XVII does not satisfy the standard prescribed or the requirements of due process. It is too late in the constitutional day to claim that the standards of fairness that must be observed in proceedings such as these permit the accumulation of multiple accusations in a single article in a manner that deprives the accused of the right to avoid conviction unless two-thirds of the Senators join in concluding he is guilty of the same offense.

The Senate tacitly recognized the unfairness in the Ritter, case after it was too late to reconsider the issue. The issue is again before the Senate in this case in a far more extreme form. Unless restrained here, there will be nothing to prevent the House from presenting multiple trivial grievances as separate articles in the expectation that the very quantity of the accusations will persuade two-thirds of the Senators to agree to a "catch-all" conviction on the ground that somewhere behind all that smoke there must be some fire. That is neither fair nor sound practice.

F.

The Senate should dismiss Articles I through XV and Article XVII. The result will be therapeutic. It will end the seven year ordeal of Judge Hastings, an ordeal that should have ended at least six years ago. The remaining article will afford the House a fair opportunity to persuade the Senate, if the House elects to pursue the matter. The burdens that such a trial would impose upon the Senate and Judge Hastings will have been reduced to manageable proportions.

The result will also be therapeutic for the future. The Senate cannot try cases such as the one that the House seeks to present here. In all probability, the Senate should no longer serve as the forum in which federal judges are tried. But unless and until the Constitution is amended, it must execute that function in a manner consistent with the constitutional plan. We submit that plan does not require or permit what the House seeks to achieve here. The House and officials in the executive and judicial branches should be so advised. The message should be sent now. The motions should be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

Terence J. Anderson.

[1] As one juror recalled it, it was not even close:

"We came to a decision, and we were a very good jury. We were sequestered. We did not have anything to do, except think about this case. . . . We did everything by the book. . . .

"[W]e did, kind of, pick over his [the judge's] testimony quite a lot. . . . [I]f you can catch somebody in one lie, you can assume they are lying through the whole thing. We picked it apart, and we could not find anything that proved to us. . . . And we finally came to the conclusion that this was not enough evidence to convict anybody of anything. . . .

"I mean, we are not even talking reasonable doubt, we are talking a lot of doubt. . . .

"[The government's case was] [c]ircumstantial evidence that was shaky at best and an investigation that did not finish. . . ."

S. Rep. No. 1, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. 108-110 (transcript of video presentation submitted to Committee on Rules and Administration including views of Ms. Debi McMullen, one of the original jurors).

[2] The House does not suggest that any principled distinction may be drawn to save its false testimony accusations from dismissal, if principle precludes a second trial, and it is clear that there is no basis for such a distinction. The federal courts have long recognized that the principle of collateral estoppel bars the government from reprosecuting an individual for perjury where the charge merely alleges that the testimony given at a prior trial denying his guilt of the substantive offense was false. See United States v. Bulter, 38 F. 498 (E.D. Mich. 1889); Chitwood v. United States, 178 F. 442 (8th Cir. 1919); Allen v. United States, 194 F. 664 (4th Cir. 1912); Ehrlich v. United States, 145 F.2d 693 (5th Cir. 1944). The Supreme Court has determined that this principle is so fundamental a corollary to the general prohibition against a second trial that it is a constitutional requirement mandated by the due process clause. Ashe v. Sevenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970). The more recent federal decisions on the point have gone further, noting expressly that "the institution of perjury charges against [a defendant] after he had been acquitted of the initial charges" presents " 'a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness.' " United States v. Eddy, 737 F.2d 564, 571 (6th Cir. 1984), quoting United States v. Andrews, 633 F.2d 449, 453 (6th Cir. 1980) (en banc), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 927 (1981).

[4] The House's claim that separation of powers analysis justifies such a second trial is also flawed. The present case pits the powers of the government against an accused individual. The individual's protection against governmental overreaching comes from the principles embodied in due process. Under those principles, the test that determines whether a second prosecution and trial are precluded is whether the second attempt is made by the "same sovereign" that initiated the first. The fact that the second proceeding is initiated by a different department or agency of that sovereign does not avoid the bar. See, e.g., Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387 (1970).

[5] The judge has instructed counsel not to challenge that article, for he agrees that a judge who made disclosures such as those alleged should be removed from office, notwithstanding the Justice Department's and his own counsels' doubts that the accusations properly allege an offense.

[7] The contemporary commentary upon which the House relies was provoked by a diffferent concern. The central issue concerned the scope of conduct that may properly be included in the standard, "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." That literature and prior practice has established that the standard permits conviction and punishment by the Senate for offenses against the state that are not offenses under federal statute. The framers understood that the breadth of the Senate's power would necessarily deny the accused the protections against ex post facto laws and bills of attainder that would be available in ordinary criminal cases. That was the principle justification for limiting the Senate's jurisdiction and the extent of the punishment it might pose. See The Federalist No. 84 at 575-76 (Hamilton).

That literature has no proper application in the context presented by this case. The framers recognized that impeachments were an extraordinary form of criminal jurisprudence in which the accused must necessarily be deprived of some of the protections enjoyed by those called to account in ordinary criminal cases before the court. They considered and specified the exceptions. By so doing they confirmed the applicability of the general rule and of those protections for which they did not specify exceptions.

(4) The Commission [established to conduct the inquiry] shall not consider—

(a) The issues dealt with in the trials leading the acquittal of the Honorable Lionel Keith Murphy of certain criminal charges on 5 July 1985 and 28 April 1986 and, in particular, the issue of the Honorable Lionel Keith Murphy's guilt or innocence of those charges; or

(b) whether the conduct to which those charges related was such as to constitute proved misbehavior within the meaning of section 72 of the Constitution, except to the extent that the Commission considers necessary for the proper examination of other issues arising in the course of the Commission's inquiry. (Emphasis supplied.)

[9] In the views of one constitutional scholar, which were provided at the request of the House subcommittee responsible for the inquiry, the nature of cases of impeachment required the application of due process principles which, in and of themselves, would require that the challenged articles be dismissed. See "Specific Proffer Regarding Fundamental Fairness Questions" (expressing the views of Professor Thomas G. ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11 a.m. on Tuesday, March 7, 1989.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. I further ask unanimous consent that following the time for the two leaders there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE TOWER NOMINATION

Mr. MITCHELL. I further ask unanimous consent that at 11:30 a.m. the Senate go into executive session to resume debate on the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS FOR PARTY CAUCUSES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that between the hours of 12:30 p.m. and 2:15 p.m. tomorrow the Senate stand in recess to accommodate the party conference luncheons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, does the Chair have an announcement?

PROGRAM

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on tomorrow the Senate will come in at 11 a.m. After time for the two leaders there will be a period for morning business not to exceed 30 minutes, with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. The Senate will be in recess between the hours of 12:30 and 2:15 to accommodate the party conference lunches. At 2:15 the Senate will return to the Tower nomination.

Under a prior unanimous consent agreement, at 4 p.m., the Senate will lay aside the Tower nomination to proceed to the nomination of Thomas Pickering to be U.N. Ambassador with a rollcall vote occurring shortly thereafter on that nomination.

For the information of my colleagues, other rollcall votes are possible during Tuesday's session.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 276(d)–276(g) as amended, appoints the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CONRAD], as the Chairman of the Senate delegation to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group during the 101st Congress.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if the distinguished acting Republican leader has no further business, and if no other Senator is seeking recognition, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 11 a.m. on Tuesday, March 7, under the previous order.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, we have no further business on this side of the aisle. I thank the majority leader.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 5:07 p.m., recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 7, 1989, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 6, 1989:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

DONALD PHINNEY GREGG, OF MARYLAND, TO BE AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ANTHONY JOSEPH PRINCIPI, OF CALIFORNIA, TO BE DEPUTY SECRETARY OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS. (NEW POSITION)

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

WILLIAM PELHAM BARR, OF VIRGINIA, TO BE AN ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, VICE DOUGLAS W. KMIEC, RESIGNED.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FEDERAL DEFICITS: HOW WE GOT INTO THIS MESS AND WHAT IT MEANS FOR OUR CHILDREN

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, during the Ways and Means Committee's February hearings on the budget, I was most impressed by the statement of Dr. Rudolph Penner of the Urban Institute.

He has done an exceptional job of broadly explaining how we got into this mess, what it means for our children, and some of the ways we can get back on course so that our children have a better life. And he says, the debate on the budget trends,

All boils down to the question of what sort of country we wish to leave to our descendents and fundamentally, this is a moral question. I find it very difficult to come up with a moral rationale for doing much less for our descendents than our ancestors did for us.

The full text of his statement follows:

ECONOMIC AND BUDGET ISSUES

(Statement of Rudolph G. Penner,* Senior Fellow, The Urban Institute)

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to testify on economic and budget issues.

THE ECONOMY

Since reaching its deepest post-World War II trough in 1982, the economy has performed admirably. We are beginning the seventh year of an extremely healthy recovery, manifested by the fact that inflationary pressures are still moderate. There are no obvious imbalances that signal that a recession is imminent, although it must be admitted that recessions are seldom recognized until after they begin.

The economy is, however, operating near, if not at, full capacity, and demand is expanding too rapidly by a very small margin. Chairman Greenspan has emphasized his concern about present rates of inflation and the Federal Reserve System is gradually tightening monetary policy. It is an environment that leaves little room for error. Too little tightness and inflation could accelerate to the point that it will be very painful to cure. Too much, and an economy that is not extremely strong could sink into recession. Under the circumstances, I believe that the Federal Reserve is doing as skillful a job as is possible.

I would like to see the Fed aim for about 6 percent nominal GNP growth over the next two years. That would maintain slight downward pressure on inflation. The Fed is not explicit about its goals, but it seems to me that current policy is, in very rough terms, consistent with this nominal GNP goal. If I am right, that is likely to allow much less real growth than is assumed by the administration in its budget projections and a bit less growth than is assumed by CBO. That would put actual attainment of the Gramm-Rudman targets beyond reach politically, but it will be much easier to reach them on paper using administration assumptions. With any good luck economically, that should still be true next August.

Any deficit reduction that can be enacted would be very helpful to the Federal Reserve. The same target for demand growth could then be achieved with lower short-term interest rates.

THE BUDGET DEFICIT

It has suddenly become stylish to argue that budget deficits do not matter much. I believe that that is far from the truth, but it is easy to understand how such a belief could arise.

Those who warned that some sort of economic catastrophe would result from the deficit are said to have been proved wrong, because the economy has behaved so well. I would provide another interpretation. Those previously crying doom and gloom may or may not have been wrong analytically, but I would argue that we shall never know. Partly in response to worries about the budget policies of the early 1980s, policy was changed significantly. A steady series of tax increases since the middle of 1982 is providing extra revenue equivalent to almost 3 percent of the GNP. Spending restraint has been impressive both in the entitlement and discretionary civilian budget categories. And most important quantitatively for spending, budget authority for defense began to be cut in real terms by roughly 2 percent per year starting in fiscal 1986.

As a result of such actions and the prolonged, healthy economic recovery, the budget deficit has fallen, relative to GNP, for a high of 6.3 percent in fiscal 1983 to 3.2 percent in fiscal 1988. I, for one, am not nearly as concerned as I was in the mid-1980s after the interest bill on the debt rose 24 percent between 1983 and 1984, and the problem threatened to explode. More recently, the interest bill has been rising at less than half that rate and has a good chance of now stabilizing relative to GNP. The probability that an exploding interest bill will eventually force us to monetize the debt and cause a hyper-inflation has become miniscule.

Another fear of many is that the dependence on foreign capital inflows engendered by the budget deficit creates inherent instability in foreign exchange markets that could lead to a foreign exchange crisis. This possibility still exists, but my own worries about it have waned considerably since early 1988 when it became clear that we had satisfactorily weathered the storm caused by the October 1987 crash. I was also reassured when private foreign investors, who had greatly reduced lending to the United States during 1987, returned in 1988. Moreover, the trade and current account deficits improved considerably in 1988.

We are still, however, expecting foreign investors to add significantly to their balances of dollar assets in percentage terms this year and there are some signs that the improvement in our external balances in ending. Consequently, the probability of a foreign exchange crisis is greater than zero, but I believe that it is considerably lower than it was only one year ago.

However, saying that the budget deficit is unlikely to cause an economic crisis is far from saying that it is not harmful. It is, in fact, having highly undesirable effects, but they are occurring slowly rather than all at once. In fiscal 1988, the Federal deficit absorbed more than 60 percent of the nation's net private saving. This extraordinary ratio is a reflection both of the large relative size of the Federal deficit compared to those of past history and the unusually small amount of net private saving.

The low level of net private saving combined with the high level of the Federal deficit implies that the nation's stock of net wealth is growing very slowly and that our generation is leaving our descendants with much less capacity to improve their standard of living than our predecessors left us.

Moreover, our descendants will face the burden that we largely escaped. After the first decade of the 21st century, the ratio of the retired to working population will rise rapidly. Therefore, if the United States remains a low saving, high deficit society, income growth will be lower than it would be otherwise and a greater portion of the income growth will have to be transferred from the working to the retired population. Nevertheless, with any luck at all, future workers should still be better off than current workers. It is just that the rate of improvement from generation to generation will be much lower than the United States has been accustomed to in past history. The size of the American economy will decline more rapidly relative to the size of other economies and this is likely to weaken our long-run military influence and our international bargaining power in trade policy and other matters.

It all boils down to the question of what sort of country we wish to leave to our descendants and fundamentally, this is a moral question. I find it very difficult to come up with a moral rationale for doing much less for our descendants than our ancestors did for us.

THINKING ABOUT THE BUDGET STRATEGICALLY

Deficit reduction has been very difficult for two reasons. First, the pain involved is immediate in the form of program cuts or higher taxes while the gains take a very long time to accrue and are fairly nebulous. Second, the issues are extraordinarily complex and difficult to explain. That is because we are not only debating the effects of the deficit per se, but we are simultaneously debating the proper role of the Federal government in our society. Those who wish to solve the bulk of the deficit problem through spending cuts clearly want a smaller government that both provides few benefits and interferes with our lives very little. Those who want to solve the problem primarily by raising taxes are saying that they are satisfied with government's role the way it is, and some would expand spending further to provide new social benefits.

In debating the role of the Federal government, it is crucial to recognize that it has only three functions that cost a lot of money. It defends the country; it provides social insurance for the elderly and disabled; and it pays interest on the national debt. Total spending on these activities will account for over 75 percent of net outlays in fiscal 1989. Defense constitutes 26 percent of net outlays, and interest, 15 percent. Social security, military and civil service pensions, and medicare account for 34 percent of net spending. In addition, a considerable portion of the medicaid, housing subsidies and nutritional assistance goes to the elderly.

None of the above is meant to imply that budget functions other than defense and caring for the elderly are unimportant. It is just that none of the multitude of programs in the rest of the budget costs very much individually, and therefore, cuts in such programs, however radical, cannot play a large role in deficit reduction. Other programs should still be scrutinized, but it is impossible to think of major changes in the future path of total spending that do not involve defense or payments to the elderly and disabled.

Indeed, much of the fiscal history of the last 20 years can be thought of as a struggle to fulfill four mutually incompatible goals. They are maintaining a strong defense, keeping the promises to the elderly inherent in various entitlement laws, and keeping budget deficits and tax burdens from rising much above the levels of the early 1960s. Oversimplifying that history considerably, it can be said that the beginnings of the conflict can be found in the late 1960s and early 1970s. It was in that era that medicare was invented and began to grow rapidly. Simultaneously, a series of real benefit increases converted the social security program from a minimal pension system to one large enough to be significant in the retirement planning of more affluent Americans. At first, the rapid growth in the cost of promises to the elderly was largely financed by the famous peace dividend as Vietnam defense spending was cut, and by a slight increase in the deficit. Payroll taxes were raised, but income taxes cut, and the total tax burden relative to GNP actually feel considerably between 1969 and 1974, partly as a result of ending the Vietnam surtax. Thus, we made the mistake of financing a quasi-permanent set of very expensive promises to the elderly largely with a source, defense cuts, that had to be temporary.

When the need to increase defense again became apparent in the late 1970s, the tax burden was allowed to rise for a time as the result of inflation, but public hostility to increasing Federal, state, and local tax burdens soared and we elected an anti-tax president. In 1981, the total Federal tax burden was cut back to levels only slightly higher than in the early 1960s and the defense buildup was accelerated. Although, a bit later, social security and the medicare payments system were reformed, the immediate outlay effect was small, the promises to the elderly remained virtually intact, and the deficit soared. Now, we are responding to the deficit problem, in part, by again cutting defense, something that cannot go on forever.

In other words, we have gone on for 20 years without explicitly admitting that we are pursuing inconsistent goals and that something important has to give. If the American people are truly resistant to any increase in the Federal tax burden above, say, 20 percent of the GNP, and if they want something approaching a balanced budget, then eventually, either our role in the world must be reexamined, so that defense can be cut significantly, or our promises to the elderly have to be reexamined, or both. Certainly, new major roles for the government in areas such as child care or long-term health care cannot be contemplated. Conversely, if the nation wishes to remain strong militarily and to maintain benefits to the elderly, as defined by current law, and if large new social programs are contemplated, then increases in the Federal tax burden to record levels must be contemplated in the longer run.

While I would like to see an explicit national debate on such issues, it is, unfortunately, easy to avoid. Eventually, the fundamental issues will have to be faced, but eventually can be a very long time away.

It is even possible to make considerable progress in reducing the deficit in the next ten years without explicitly facing these fundamental issues, but it will not be possible 20 years from now. Delay is now possible because of fortuitous circumstances, and because of the very long time horizon that has to be used in analyzing budget policy.

The most important fortuitous event is a slowing, through 2005, in the rate of growth of the elderly population because of the birth trough during the Great Depression. This eases budget pressures somewhat for the next 15 years. Ideally, this respite should be used to get our fiscal house in order and to make some fundamental decisions about policy changes for the period after 2005. Unfortunately, the respite also makes it possible to delay such decisions.

Another fortuitous event has not yet come to fruition and, at this point, it is not certain that it will occur, but if Gorbachev really reduces the intensity with which the Soviet Union pursues the military competition between the superpowers, considerable savings in defense should be possible. Even absent a fundamental change in military strategy, defense growth can be curbed for a good long while.

In a number of budget areas, I am always impressed at how long spending can be cut without undertaking a fundamental change in policy. Defense provides an excellent example of this phenomenon. Between 1980 and 1985 real defense outlays rose 7 percent per year. Now they are beginning to decline in real terms because of a lagged response to real cuts in budget authority beginning in fiscal 1986. However, it is difficult to perceive any significant difference in foreign policy or military strategy, or even military tactics, between the early 1980s and the late 1980s, even though spending policy changed radically. There would seem to be something wrong with the phenomenon, and indeed, there is. Investment has been cut disproportionately—it always seems easy to cut investment in both the military and civilian budgets—but few weapons systems have been eliminated. Purchases are being stretched out and some weapons are being produced at uneconomic rates. The military are basing long-term planning on the assumption that there will be real growth in budget authority when that seems highly unlikely. It is possible that we shall end up with unbalanced forces or return to the deplorable state of readiness existing the the late 1970s. It is to be hoped that same major changes in defense budget policy will be forthcoming from the Bush Administration, because recent approaches do not seem viable for the very long run.

A similar situation exists in medicare. Spending growth has been slowed significantly without major changes in the basic structure of the program. Considerable, justifiable savings have recently resulted from squeezing down payments to hospitals, and somewhat less successful attempts have been made to curb the growth of payments to physicians. However meritorious such reforms may be, they can only be successful in the short run. There are obvious limits to how much suppliers can be squeezed. And every time the squeeze is halted, the fundamental structure of the program reveals itself and outlays will again begin to grow at a real rate approximating 8 percent per year. Clearly, in the very long run, the basic structure of the program will have to be significantly reformed or Americans must be prepared to see their HI taxes steadily raised.

If, in the interest of keeping tax burdens relatively constant and maintaining a strong military establishment, significant changes in payments to the elderly were enacted, it is important to phase them in slowly, so that people have time to adjust their retirement plans and private savings. That, of course, means that not must immediate deficit reduction can result from such reforms. But if the rate of growth of payments to the elderly is slowed in the very long run, immediate deficit reduction becomes less urgent because the burdens faced by future workers will be lessened.

For an example of a significant reform, suppose that, for the period following 2009, the Congress decided to increase the normal retirement age under social security somewhat more rapidly than in contemplated in current law and to eventually raise it to age 70. Suppose, at the same time, the eligibility age for medicare was increased along with the normal retirement age. Nothing would be saved in the short run, but the current present value of future savings would be substantial. It is unfortunate that our current budget process cannot give a "deficit reduction" credit currently for that sort of reform. I would not advocate a formal process reform that would do that, because it would be too complicated and our process is already far too complicated. But it would certainly be legitimate, having enacted long-run savings, to adjust the deficit target upward as it currently measured. Moreover, it would be important to actually enact such a change quickly, so that current workers would get plenty of warning about a change in the rules of the game.

Reasonable increases in the retirement age combined with an increased eligibility age for medicare would not be sufficient to, say, hold social security plus medicare to a constant share of GNP through the middle of the next century, and many other significant reforms would be necessary. It is simply not possible to maintain current tax burdens in the long run without accepting some very fundamental changes in what the Federal government does now and has promised for the future.

Conversely, it is impossible to continue into the long run fulfilling all of our promises and balancing the budget without raising taxes significantly. If this is to be our long-run approach, it is probably time to start thinking about developing a new source of revenues. Without a new revenue source, payroll and/or income tax rates will have to be raised substantially. That will increase the distortions created by these taxes and make them more difficult to administer. A new, broad based consumption tax would have considerable appeal as a substitute for such rate increases.

In between these two extreme strategies, one can contemplate lowering the growth rate of payments to the elderly less radically, reducing the size of our defense commitments, and raising taxes less dramatically. Past records for tax burdens would have to be breeched, but the needed revenues could probably be obtained within the current structure of the tax system without necessitating a brand new tax.

In accomplishing this goal, most economists would like to keep marginal tax rates as low as possible while broadening the tax base as much as possible, because it is the marginal tax burden on the last bit of private saving or work effort that creates disincentives and imposes efficiency costs. In broadening the base, I would also prefer to do so in a way that discourages consumption rather than saving. Some excise tax rate increases would also be required under this strategy.

This committee is well acquainted with the available excise tax and base broadening options, and I shall not discuss them in detail. There were essentially three potential tax bases left relatively unscathed by tax reform—owner occupied housing, fringe benefits, and untaxed government benefits. All have large potential revenue yields.

CONCLUSION

I have, in this testimony, attempted to focus on some very fundamental issues that should dominate the debate over the Federal budget over the next decade. Unfortunately, that does not provide very specific guidance about what to do during this difficult budget year.

I would like to see a debate about the fundamentals begin, but the administration and the Congress are likely to adopt highly optimistic economic and other assumptions that suggest that there is not a fundamental problem. No economist can argue with certainty that these optimistic goals will not be attained in the long run, but no one would argue that a corporation should make its long run plans on the assumption that everything will work out just right. I do not think that the Congress should either. Unfortunately, Gramm-Rudman creates strong incentives for assuming the problem away. This is its most undesirable feature, but I am realistic enough to realize that it is extremely difficult to change this soon enough to affect fiscal 1990. I also hesitate to suggest that the president casually yield on his "no tax" promise, because it was so firmly made to the American people. But if these constraints are accepted, progress on the deficit, that I believe is so urgently needed, will be modest.

I do believe that some is possible, however. The new administration seems willing to take a hard look at defense tactics, and perhaps, the cuts from current policy can be somewhat more efficient than those of the recent past. A bit more can probably be squeezed from medicare, and some of the program eliminations suggested by President Reagan should be examined carefully. It may also be possible to find some revenue increases that are too small to quack especially in the user fee area.

In total, however, the constraints are formidable and they severely limit what can be accomplished this year. Looking forward, however, it seems clear that some of the constraints will have to be broken as we move toward fiscal 1991. If I am right about the economy and the limits on deficit reduction this year, the 1991 Gramm-Rudman target will be far from reach. It would be useful for the Congress to undertake a reexamination of this law early. The modifications undertaken because of the Supreme Court decision placed enormous power in the hands of the executive branch. This year, come August, the OMB has the power to assume that whatever the Congress does is consistent with the target or it can assume that it is a bit short of the target, thus forcing additional action to avoid a sequester. Or it can be sure that a sequester occurs.

It may be a good time to look at the entire budget process. In a recent book, "Broken Purse Strings," Alan Abramson and I suggested that the process be modified in a way that formalizes recent summit arrangements that have been responsible for considerable deficit progress in the recent past. This would involve somewhat increasing the power of the president and the Congressional leadership in the budget process. However, the power of the president would be enhanced much less than is inherent in the current version of Gramm Rudman.

Perhaps, a deal is possible. One of the reasons that there is so much opposition to a tax increase is the worry that it will not go to deficit reduction, but that it will all be spent. Giving the president a bit more power to limit spending may dampen opposition to a tax increase. I am, of course, assuming that if we had the fundamental debate on what government does, as described above, the public and even the administration would opt for some tax increase to avoid the significant reduction in the government's current role and promises for the future that will be necessary if tax increases are ruled out for the long run.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN H. MARTENS, SR.

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my respects to John H. Martens, Sr., who passed away January 23, 1989. I join with his family, friends, and fellow veterans in paying tribute to this fine man.

John Martens was a hero and patriot, having been awarded 38 different medals while serving in the Asian and European Theaters during World War II. Mr. Martens was Maryland's most honored soldier, and was, at one time, the fourth most decorated man in the Nation. He received the Distinguished Service Cross, three Bronze Stars, three Purple Hearts, two Silver Stars, and a variety of medals from the Phillipines, Belgium, the Netherlands, and France.

Mr. Martens entered the U.S. Army at the age of 18. He witnessed some of the fiercest early fighting in the Phillipines. After recuperating from wounds, he was sent to Germany, He served in Korea. His valor and courage in defense of this great Nation is unsurpassed. He retired as a master sergeant in 1966, and had lived for the past several years on Maryland's Eastern Shore, in Salisbury.

John Martens was a hero, a gentleman, and an American patriot. I join all my colleagues in extending my deepest sympathy to his widow, Helen, and to his six children.

DUE PROCESS FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the denial of a security clearance can mean the denial of a job for millions of Americans who work for the Department of Defense and for defense contractors. It is important that the decision to grant or deny a clearance be based on accurate information and that an individual have the opportunity to respond to charges that may result in a clearance denial. The recent controversy over the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense has generated charges of unfairness. Well, the President has on his desk a draft executive order that would deny basic due process to applicants for security clearances. In an op-ed piece in yesterday's New York Times, Adam Yarmolinsky compellingly outlined the issues at stake.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 5, 1989]

SHADES OF MCCARTHYISM

(By Adam Yarmolinsky)

CATONSVILLE, MD.—George Bush now has on his desk a little noticed executive order that threatens to revive one of the excesses of the McCarthy era. The order, prepared in the final days of the Reagan Administration, would scrap the appeals process for Federal security clearances. This, in turn, would allow the Government to deny clearances to Federal workers or to the employees of Government contractors, without any explanation.

As a young lawyer in the early 1950's, representing individual and corporate clients whose security clearances were challenged, I learned the importance of minimum standards of fairness in an area where judgments are necessarily subjective. And I saw what harm was done by timid, narrow-minded or bigoted administrators before there was any machinery to review their decisions.

We've long forgotten about cases like that of the young man who suggested that his landlady try the community chest to help her find a buyer for her large rooming house. "Community chest" sounded like "Communism" to the landlady, and the lodger's career in public service might have ended right there, had there been no avenue of appeal.

Or there was the incident, documented in a collection of case studies I put together in 1955, involving an employee of the Government Printing Office who was denied a security clearance after his security officer heard "left-wing talk" from him. The officer said the worker had been heard to describe himself (a black man) "as a second-class citizen." In a hearing, it emerged that the employee actually had said he would "rather be a second-class citizen in Mississippi than a first-class citizen in Russia."

Then there was the case of the man who was charged with having read "literature of a subversive nature," which apparently covered Karl Marx's "Das Kapital," Thorstein Veblen's "Theory of the Leisure Class," and Oswald Spengler's "Decline of the West," and having "belittled" the capitalist system. The man was later cleared, but it is still worth remembering that the system generated charges of this kind, and they reverberated through the ranks of the civil service and the defense industry.

Of course, no one has a right to a security clearance. That's not the issue. But millions of people in Government and the defense industry need clearances to do their jobs. Unless there is some entity to review executive decisions, groundless suspicion will tend to replace reasonable judgment about security risks. In the end, independent thought and expression may be curbed by fear of retaliation.

Appeals boards are no guarantee of fairness. Some of the more outrageous decisions in my collection of cases were made by appeals boards. But at least they offer a chance for review by people who owe no fealty to the supervisors who made the original judgment.

On balance, appeals boards have proven their value. They discourage officials from using the security system as a pretext for pursuing dissenters, nonconformists and oddballs, or as another way around cumbersome civil service dismissal procedures.

This, in turn, makes it more likely that the Government will pursue genuine security risks. As the former John F. Kennedy adviser, McGeorge Bundy, once observed before a Congressional committee: "If we guard our toothbrushes and diamonds with equal zeal, we will lose fewer toothbrushes and more diamonds."

It is ironic that in a time when the Russians seem to be reining in their runaway security apparatus, the United States is proposing to remove one of the basic controls over our security system. President Bush should reject this artifact of the Reagan Administration.

CONGRESSIONAL AWARD

OF TEXAS

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the information of Members the 1988 Report from the Chairman of the Board of the Congressional Award to the Congress of the United States, March 1, 1989:

1988 REPORT FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

I am pleased to present to you, The Members of Congress, the 1988 Annual Report of the Congressional Award as required by PL 96-114, the Congressional Award Act.

During the summer of 1988, reauthorization hearings were held by the House Select Education Committee. The testimony recognized problems that needed mending. The GAO report also pointed to problems that needed a remedy.

In response to the constructive criticism, the Board has taken decisive action to begin a process of remediation. A plan of action was developed; and from September 1, 1989 through December 31, 1989, the plan has been operationalized. Because of the renewed credibility demonstrated by the Board, the reauthorization was passed in both Houses of Congress and PL 100-674 was signed by President Reagan on November 17, 1988. Some of the highlights of the year follow. Most of these accomplishments have taken place after September 1, 1989.

The Board has been reorganized with the elections of new officers and the establishment of a new committee structure. The officers are Merlin E. Dewing, Chairman; Frank H. Arlinghaus Jr., Vice Chairman for Program; William Plough, Vice Chairman for Administration; Kevin Campbell, Treasurer; and Stuart MacIntire, Secretary.

A new National Director, Joseph J. Gouthro, has been appointed. Mr. Gouthro, a member of the National Board, has agreed to serve as National Director to stabilize the National Office, in its relations with Congress, to ensure an orderly development of the program across the country, and to oversee appropriate and adequate fundraising.

New fundraising initiatives have been developed under the Finance Committee chaired by Mr. Plough. The National Director has been charged to develop grant proposals for a number of foundations and corporations who have expressed an interest in youth. Other ideas for fundraising are being developed. Mr. W. Clement Stone, to whom we owe much, has forgiven the major debt of the Foundation in the amount of $306,000.00.

Since the nonrenewable lease had expired at the United Way Building in Alexandria, and the conservation of funds was essential, the new Director was able to secure free space within two blocks of the United Way Building. This space is available until August 1989. We owe our gratitude to Mr. Androus, owner of the building, the United Food and Commercial Workers of America who pay the rent and the National Office of the American Red Cross, who in fact made the building available to the National Office of the Congressional Award.

The American Red Cross, who also use some of the building space, pay the heat and utilities. This generous gift represents an in-kind donation of approximately $22,000.00 for the length of time the space is available.

The staff has been reduced to three positions: a National Director, a Director of Operations and an Administrative Assistant/Secretary. Both the National Director and the Director of Operations spend a great deal of their time in providing field services across the country, mainly by phone and correspondence with some limited travel.

The National Director, with the help of Dr. Arlinghaus, a Vice Chairman of the Board and Chairman of the Government Relations Committee, has been able to successfully meet the needs of Congress. They have begun to make Members and their staff aware of the Congressional Award as an instrument of Congress to motivate towards, and recognize, the achievement of young people (age 14 through 23) in voluntary public service, personal development and physical fitness with the presentation of a Bronze, Silver or Gold Congressional Award Medal. They have successfully reestablished relations with the Leadership to ensure that Congressional Award matters are handled appropriately at that level.

The field services work, together with the congressional relations work, resulted in the development of many new Councils and Advisory Boards. The process for developing a Congressional Award in a district has been greatly simplified. At the same time, a true role has been found for the Members of the U.S. Senate who do not traditionally relate to their constituents by district, but by state.

We have reinstituted Gold Congressional Award Ceremonies held in the Capitol and presided over by a Member of the Leadership. The first of these Ceremonies was held on September 28, 1988 in the Senate Caucus Room, Russell Senate Office Building. Two ceremonies a year will be scheduled.

In all, the steps we have taken to stabilize and develop the Congressional Award, have begun to bear fruit. The upward trend in the level of interest among Members of Congress has been gratifying. While much remains to be done, we believe that, as we approach the Tenth Anniversary of the Congressional Award on November 16, 1989, we will have brought the Congressional Award to its highest level yet as a force of motivation and recognition for the valuable contributions of the young people of America in voluntary public service, personal development and physical fitness.

We thank the leadership and the Members of Congress for an increased level of support and cooperation. As we look to the future, we expect to build on our gains of this past year to make the tenth year of the Congressional Award the best ever.

Respectfully submitted,

MERLIN E. DEWING,
Chairman of the Board.

ETHNIC AMERICANS

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address a recent political and journalistic tendency which I find bothersome—the rampant, uninformed use of the term "ethnic."

The term "ethnic" has become a trendy statement—being defined by too many people, who have too little real knowledge to ever use it accurately.

Anne Keegan's recent story in the Chicago Tribune entitled "Has the term white ethnic lost its value," is a case in point.

Fortunately, ethnics have been around a lot longer than the political consultants, pollsters and political writers who think they invented ethnics and are now trying to define them.

The term "ethnic" when properly used means first, someone who is Catholic. Second, someone who is middle or working class of one or a mixture of the following backgrounds: Lithuanian, Italian, Polish, Irish, German, Croatian, Ukranian, Armenian, Bohemian, and other Eastern and Southern European descents. And, third and finally, people with a more conservative set of values and a shared cultural upbringing.

People who believe in God and prayer and feel that there should be room for both in our daily lives and in our schools. People who believe in family, our country, patriotism, and hard work. People who respect the flag, the laws, and who pay their taxes. People who actually feel emotion when they sing our national anthem.

Ethnics are not just found in large cities. They are in suburbs and small towns as well, but in large communities or small—enough must be in the same geographical area so as to maintain a shared cultural set of values and experiences.

Ethnic neighborhoods are easily recognizable by the clean sidewalks and well-cared lawns. By parishes that are filled on Sunday, VFW halls that are used for gatherings, a lot of bakeries, and homes that fly the American flag on holidays. It is a set of values and a lifestyle.

Ethnic therefore is a real term with a real definition. That is far different from the term "white ethnic," which people involved in politics have used with increasing frequency in the last few years. A term that was coined mostly out of frustration by pollsters and reporters to cover wrong political predictions. It was and is a nice way of explaining racial voting patterns. That's what's wrong. It's too broad, too simplistic, and lumps together too many people who have little else in common.

These same political types who have made the term fashionable have, at the same time, tried to make it unfashionable to exhibit many beliefs that real ethnics hold, implying that it's immoral to oppose all abortions, racist to support capital punishment, and so forth. They have dismissed ethnics as generally racist, ignoring the facts that ethnics have slated, supported, and voted for blacks and Hispanics for many elected offices.

As the founder and cochairman of the Democratic National Committee's Council on Ethnic Americans, and as someone of Polish descent, who serves in Congress representing a district that is 75 percent ethnic, not white ethnic, I feel qualified to speak on this issue.

Has the term "white ethnic" lost its value? I hope so, since it never had any real value in the first place. The term "ethnic," however, when properly used, has not lost its value, and ethnics will not lose their values. And we certainly will not let some political pollster take them or our identity away. They did not invent us, and they cannot uninvent us, as they try to do in Ann Keegan's article. America's ethnics have been ignored and taken for granted for too long already.

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, February 24 marked Estonian Independence Day, a day of particular importance for Estonians around the world and here in America. This year, in stark contrast to the past, the Soviet authorities permitted the public celebration of the founding of the pre-Soviet Estonian state in 1918. In this important, if symbolic, way the Soviet Government has shown a more liberal stance toward history and national traditions.

This past year was a remarkable one for Estonia. During the course of 1988, the Estonian people displayed unity, determination, and respect for the law in their campaign for democracy and national sovereignty. The Estonian liberal intelligentsia played a leading role in starting this process when they organized informal groups to discuss perestroika. An important role was also played by recently released prominent Estonian political prisoners, suchas Enn Tarto and Mart Niklus.

Two significant new political groups were founded in Estonia last year. The first organization is the Estonian National Independence Party [ENIP], established on August 20, 1988, which advocates the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Estonia as the first step toward the establishment of an independent Estonian state. In September, the ENIP sent an eight-page memorandum to the United Nations, describing Soviet violations for international law. The second group is the Estonian Popular Front [EFP]—the first such organization in the Baltic States or the Soviet Union—which held its founding congress in October 1988. The EFP has some 250,000 members, bringing together Estonian intellectuals, workers, along with party and nonparty members. The EFP sets forth a complex program, focussing on legal reform of the major aspects of Estonian public life. The aim of this program is to increase Estonian control over all aspects of Estonian society, while remaining part of the Soviet Union.

As a result of Estonian concerns that a series of proposed amendments to the Soviet Constitution would further reduce the rights of republics vis-a-vis Moscow, in November the Estonian Supreme Soviet voted to make Estonian laws take precedence over Soviet laws on Estonian territory. This unprecedented action—rejected by Moscow—by an official government body, showed how far Estonia had come along the path of real popular expression.

Despite the Kremlin rebuff of Estonian legal protests, Estonian public opinion shows no signs of giving up. In January 1989, ENIP and the Independent Information Center held a public discussion on "How to Restore Estonian Independence," attended by 500 people, at Tartu University. The EFP also continues its activities, including backing certain candidates for the March elections to the national Supreme Soviet.

February 24, then, as Estonians everywhere celebrated their Independence Day, they also should take pride in the knowledge that Estonia is blazing new trails in its peaceful mass campaign for legal rights, as it struggles for real national sovereignty.

RICHMOND CRINKLEY, EDUCATOR PRODUCER

HON. NORMAN SISISKY

OF VIRGINIA

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. SISISKY. Mr. Speaker, I am sad to say that last month the Fourth Congressional District of Virginia lost one of its most accomplished native sons. Richmond Crinkley, born in Blackstone, VA, died at the Medical College of Virginia in Richmond on January 29. He was buried in Blackstone on February 1.

Richmond Crinkley received bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees from the University of Virginia and was then a Fulbright fellow at Oxford University in England from 1965 to 1976. After that he taught for 2 years at the University of North Carolina.

He achieved his great distinction in the theater, where he had a long and successful career as a producer. Its pinnacle was perhaps his productions of "The Elephant Man," a play he first produced off Broadway in New York, and then on Broadway, where it earned him the Tony Award for best play of 1980, and numerous other awards, including the Drama Critics Circle, Drama Desk, Outer Critics, Obie and Los Angeles Drama Critics Circle Awards.

Crinkley also produced other successful and important shows, including "Tintypes" and "Passions" on Broadway, and numerous television productions for PBS and ABC, including "Macbeth" and "Diary of a Madman."

Much of his theatrical career was here in Washington, DC, where he founded the Folger Theatre Group—forerunner of today's Folger Shakespeare Theatre—and was its producer from 1969 to 1973. He then became assistant to the chairman of the Kennedy Center, serving from 1973 to 1976, where he oversaw such productions as "Long Day's Journey Into Night," "Sweet Bird of Youth," and "The Skin of Our Teeth." In 1976, he returned to New York to serve as director of, first the American National Theatre and Academy, and then the Vivian Beaumont Theatre of the Lincoln Center, where he produced "Elephant Man."

Even though he achieved about as much worldly success as most people dream of, he never lost touch with his roots in Blackstone, VA. He remained very close to his family and visited them frequently. There, he also kept in touch with many boyhood friends, who still knew him as "Rich" Crinkley, always having time to stop and chat with them on the streets of the town.

Richmond Crinkley was not only a successful man but also a public-spirited one. When the tragic AIDS epidemic began to take its terrible toll in the theatrical community, Crinkley was moved to action. He approached public officials with whom he served on various theatre boards and advocated funding for public programs to fight and, hopefully, cure this disease. One result of his efforts was a special appropriation to help pay the enormous cost of AZT, the first drug licensed to treat AIDS, for those who otherwise could not afford it.

Richmond Crinkley was then struck down in the prime of his life by another incurable disease, multiple myeloma. Characteristically, he spent the last year of his life energetically seeking to participate in medical research that would benefit, if not him, then others who suffered from the same condition. Sadly, he lost this fight at the age of 49.

Dr. Samuel Broder, Director of the National Cancer Institute, paid tribute in this way. "There's a saying that no one is irreplaceable. In Richmond Crinkley's case that is not true. We will not be able to replace him * * * He was an exceptional person, fine intellect * * * a strong friend of the Cancer Institute."

I have told you a little of what we all lost with Richmond Crinkley. I also want to offer my condolences to his family in their very personal loss—his parents, Sarah and James Epes Crinkley of Blackstone, and his brother, James E. Crinkley, Jr., of Colonial Heights. Let me just tell them that I am proud to represent here the family and the community that gave Richmond Crinkley to the world, and I am sure that his contributions to the happiness of his contemporaries will long be remembered.

EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong support for the International Association of Machinists and pilots at Eastern Airlines in their confrontation with Eastern management. I also join the International Association of Machinists, the AFL-CIO and the National Mediation Board in urging President Bush to take decisive action to facilitate a settlement by appointing an emergency board to mediate this dispute.

Throughout the last 2 years of negotiations, management has pursued shortsighted counterproductive labor policies which have created a crippling duel which could have far reaching ramifications for air travel in this country. Eastern management has been attempting to bust the unions by its intransigent negotiating posture and has been systematically dismantling Eastern by selling its most profitable assets and siphoning off profits from Eastern to Texas Air and Continental.

This current impasse has created chaos in the Nation's air transportation network and a quick resolution is critical, not only to the future of Eastern, but to the quality of air service in major markets such as Los Angeles. A good faith collective bargaining effort on the part of management and labor is now vital to avert a fatal blow to Eastern Airlines and to avoid the prospects of prolonged massive service disruptions.

I am disappointed that the President did not follow the advice of the National Mediation Board to appoint an emergency mediation panel to avoid the strike. Now that the strike has commenced, it is in the best interest of the employees, management and the travelling public that the Congress send a clear signal of its willingness to protect the Nation's transportation network.

There can be no winners in this crippling strike. A prolonged dispute could be a fatal blow to Eastern and could send shock waves throughout the industry. Reporting legislation requiring the appointment of an emergency mediation panel is the prudent course of action to help resolve this impasse.

AMERICAN HIKING SOCIETY'S VOLUNTEER VACATIONS PROGRAM IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to share with the Members of Congress an article, written by William H. Wilcox and published in the October 1988 issue of Courier magazine, regarding the outstanding contribution that the volunteers of the "American Hiking Society Volunteer Vacations Organization" gave to the National Park Service in their efforts to spruce up the Virgin Islands National Park lands on St. John.

[From the Courier magazine, October 1988]

(By William H. Wilcox)

HARD AT WORK IN THE VIRGIN ISLES

"All AHS work groups have consistently exceeded my expectations," exclaimed gleeful Park Ranger Barney Stoffel one day last February.

It was the day a seven-person volunteer trail crew completed his two-year hiking trail restoration project in the eastern part of Virgin Islands NP. The crew was there as part of the American Hiking Society's Volunteer Vacations Program, which sends such crews to parks and forests around the country to perform needed trail work.

This 11-square-mile national park on St. Johns covers more than 50% of the island and a major portion of the surrounding waters. Barney Stoffel's district covers the eastern end of the island and a major portion of the north shore. A member of the AHS, Barney has been a ranger in Everglades NP and Gulf Island NS.

Barney's wife, Dee, once an environmental education instructor, handled the menu planning for our backcountry trail maintenance project on the remote northeastern coast of the park. All food and fresh water had to be brought to us by Park Service boat or packed in. Dee was a volunteer like us, devoting many hours to planning a balanced diet for our group. She even baked us a delicious cheesecake that Barney packed into our campsite.

One of the great satisfactions of this "hard labor" ten-day vacation in the tropic heat was the fact that much of our time was spent opening up the Brown Bay trail to park hikers who now can visit remote ruins of an old cemetery, two Great Houses, and a slaughter house that is the only one of its kind on St. John. In the quiet of the thorny, tangled dry scrub forest among the ruins you can, if you stop a moment, imagine the plantation activities of an earlier century: the tensions as the slaves struggled for freedom, plus the daily efforts to grow sugar cane, cotton, and, later in the island's history, raise cattle.

The last few days of our vacation on St. John we bunked at the Virgin Islands Ecological Research Station. Here energetic college students earned credits in such subjects as marine biology, cultural ecology, and resources management.

Nearby, on the Bordeaux Trail, we built stone waterbars to retard trail erosion on a former ox track. The work was strenuous but rewarding as we exclaimed over the skill of our work and debated which pair of volunteers had constructed the most efficient water diversion. The vacation was completed with the opening of trailside vistas on the steep, sunny hillsides. The resulting views of Lameshur Bay, the surrounding hills, and St. Croix, 40 miles in the distance, seemed to justify the territory's autotag designation, "Virgin Islands, American Paradise."

Now that Barney's ambitious two-year project is finished, the product of more than 1,000 hours of work on the trails by 40 volunteers, I asked him what is next. Behind his dark glasses I imagined I saw eyes light up. "Why, the Brown Bay Trail needs to be stablized. Other trails need to be maintained." He even confided his private dream; a hiking trail running the length of St. John with his backcountry campsites.

If, as Emerson said, every good idea is the lengthened shadow of a single man, perhaps Barney's dream may come true.

In the meantime, volunteers of the American Hiking Society are pleased to have contributed their labor to making Virgin Islands National Park more usable to hikers and to historians, who can now reach the striking ruins from the island's plantation era in order to prevent further deterioration as part of the park's historic preservation program.

H.R. 1149

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, with appreciation for the support of the gentlewoman from Louisiana, Mrs. BOGGS, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WILLIAM FORD, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 1149, that relates to a subject that should be on the mind of every Member, the Bicentennial of the Congress of the United States.

As we all know, the Constitution was drafted and signed in Philadelphia in 1787, and nearly 2 years passed before the process of ratification was completed leading to the first congressional elections in the fall of 1788. In March 1789, the First Congress convened in New York City, followed by the inauguration of our first President, George Washington, in April, and the Government of the United States under the Constitution began to function.

Two centuries later we are not only celebrating the 200th birthday of our Constitution, but even more remarkable, we honor the oldest continuing system of national government under a written charter in existence in the world.

Plans are well along to commemorate the Bicentennial of the Congress with a number of special programs and projects that will take place here at the Capitol and elsewhere in Washington, DC. I would like to commend to all Members' attention the excellent work being done by the respective Bicentennial Commissions of the Senate and House. I especially wish to acknowledge LINDY BOGGS for her work as the chairman of the House Commission, and to express my pleasure for the opportunity to serve with her as the two Representatives of the House appointed to the National Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution.

LINDY has brought great experience and knowledge to her current assignments having previously served with distinction as a leader in the commemoration of the American Revolution Bicentennial in 1976. Not only has LINDY devoted great effort to helping the National Constitution Bicentennial Commission achieve some of its most ambitious and noteworthy programs, closer to home she has worked carefully with the House leadership to give substance and direction to the projects being undertaken by the House Bicentennial Office and its staff headed by Dr. Ray Smock. Final preparations are being made for numerous programs, exhibits, and publications honoring the Bicentennial of the Congress that will be offered this year.

Although Members and visitors to our Nation's Capital, as well as academicians working on specific projects, will be fully cognizant of the congressional bicentennial, much of what is being planned will have its greatest impact on audiences who are inside the Washington Beltway. I believe that since the Congress is the branch of the Federal Government closest to the American people, its bicentennial should be commemorated not only on Constitution and Independence Avenues, but also on the Main Streets across America.

We have an opportunity to share this special occasion with our constituents in a way that will achieve the further benefit of increasing citizen knowledge of the very bedrock of our Government, the U.S. Constitution.

We are proposing that a special commemorative pocket-size version of the Constitution honoring the Bicentennial of the Congress be printed through contributions of the private sector, and then be given to Members for distribution as a postal patron mailing that has the potential to reach every household in the United States.

These Constitutions will be attractively designed to make them worthy of being saved by citizens as a memento of an important event in American history. Each copy would contain in addition to the text of the Constitution a listing of major donors, a subject index, the names of the members of the National Constitution Bicentennial Commission, and a printed letter from the Member to his or her constituents.

LINDY BOGGS is joining me in a "Dear Colleague" letter to all House Members which will include along with information about the legislation we are sponsoring a preliminary sample of how these Constitutions might look. We are also enclosing a questionnaire about this project and are inviting comments and suggestions from all Members.

The bill being introduced today is designed to provide a one-time waiver of the franking statutes to allow Members to distribute these Constitutions as one of the six postal patron mailings permitted each year. We are especially grateful to Congressman BILL FORD, chairman of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service for his full cooperation and expert guidance that helped greatly in drafting this bill, and for his support of this project as an original cosponsor of this legislation.

This project has the potential to be a win-win situation. The public wins by receiving an educational commemorative keepsake having historical value and significance, the Congress wins by achieving broad public recognition of its bicentennial, the Constitution wins by gaining increased citizen awareness of its provisions—including civic rights as well as responsibilities, Members win by having the opportunity to communicate with constituents on behalf of a worthy project whose production cost will be underwritten by donated funds and whose distribution will be achieved through mailing privileges already available, and the private sector wins by achieving good will and name recognition through participation in an official congressional publication which has the potential of reaching 100 million residences throughout the United States.

This unique opportunity is made possible because the Congress created the National Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, which as a Federal agency is empowered to receive contributions from the private sector to support constitutional commemorative programs, and which, in turn, can work with the Congress in helping produce and make these booklets available to Members for their use. The legislation being introduced today takes care of the only remaining issue by allowing these Constitutions to be mailed under the frank through a one-time special waiver in recognition of the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress.

I would like to invite all Members from both sides of the aisle to join in this special, historic, and nonpartisan effort. You can do so by joining as a cosposor of our legislation being introduced today, and by completing the questionnaire offering your views and suggestions about this project. We also encourage you to bring this project to the attention of major corporations, associations, civic groups, educational organizations, and even individuals who you feel might be interested in participating as a private sponsor.

I invite corporations and others who might wish to be associated with this project to contact my office for information. The goals we are setting are both ambitious and noble. I hope we can act to take advantage of an opportunity that will come but once in our lifetimes.

THE BUDGET REFORM ACT OF 1989

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, since the 1974 Budget Act went into effect, the Congress has managed to pass all 13 regular appropriation bills in only 2 fiscal years. As a result, in most years, we rolled most Federal spending into one continuing resolution and then passed it after the new fiscal year had already begun. And despite the fact that the budget process established by the Budget Act was intended to force Congress to reconcile spending with revenues—in other words keep a balanced budget—the Federal budget has grown, and large budget deficits continue to pose a threat to the long-term economic well-being of the Nation. I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that it's time to clean up our budget process. That is why today, along with a bipartisan group of our colleagues, I am introducing the Budget Reform Act of 1989.

Under the provisions of this legislation, the Federal budget would be put on a pay-as-you-go [PAYGO] basis. In addition, this bill requires biennial appropriations and gives the President a line-item veto, subject to a simple majority override by the Congress.

Pay-as-you-go budgeting requires the Congress to find funding for the programs it passes. If spending is increased for one program, a corresponding cut would be required in the budget of another program. This approach is no different than the one that a majority of States and cities must follow in adopting their own budget plans.

Like PAYGO, biennial budgeting is a process that many States and localities use in their own budgeting. Unlike single-year appropriations however, biennial budgeting provides the time necessary to plan and implement a budget. Under my proposal, the first year of the budget cycle would be set aside for more thorough oversight by congressional committees than is currently possible. In the second year, all appropriations decisions would be completed.

A line-item veto with a simple majority override would give the President the ability to veto "lines" of an appropriations bill just as he now has the power to veto the whole measure. Because the Congress passes omnibus continuing resolutions, the traditional veto "check and balance" of the President has been effectively removed. The Budget Reform Act of 1989 returns to the President the ability to review the spending decisions made by the Congress. The Congress, though, would have the power to override a line-item veto by a simple majority vote.

Mr. Speaker, I invite you and my other colleagues to join me in establishing a budget process that is workable and will put us on the road to significant deficit reduction.

PERRY JOHNSON, A UAW LEADER

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Speaker, on March 10 in Sterling Heights, MI, there will be a testimonial dinner for a good friend of mine who has been an active member of the UAW since the 1940's. Perry Johnson, the director of UAW region 1 and a member of the UAW's international executive board, will be retiring at the union's triennial convention in Anaheim, CA, in June of this year.

In addition to his union responsibilities, Perry Johnson is a highly respected and dedicated community leader in southeast Michigan. He is a lifetime member of the NAACP as well as an active Democrat. His participation in the UAW Community Services Program has won him recognition for his services to the poor, the disabled, and the needy.

Perry Johnson has been active in the union since he went to work at the Ford Motor Co.'s Sterling plant in Sterling Heights, MI, in 1948. Since them, he has served in a number of leadership positions, starting with his election as a local union committeeman 1951, as a member of the local's bargaining committee and finally as vice president of UAW Local 228.

After 4 years in that position, Perry was appointed to the UAW's organizing staff in 1969. He served there until 1975 when he was named to the staff of region 1.

Two years later, in 1977, he was appointed assistant director of the region by then region 1 director Steve Yokich. Perry Johnson was elected regional director to succeed Yokich at UAW's 1980 convention.

The region, which has its headquarters in Warren covers a substantial portion of southeast Michigan, including Macomb and St. Clair Counties and a small part of Detroit bordering on Macomb County.

Perry Johnson, 66, was born in Georgia but lived in Florida from the age of 2 months until he joined the Army in 1942. He served 3 years in Europe during World War II, and moved to Michigan in 1945 following his military service.

Active in Democratic politics, Perry Johnson also has had a leadership role in UAW's Community Action Program in the southeast Michigan area.

Perry Johnson and his wife, Thomasina, reside in Detroit. They are the parents of a daughter, Mrs. Jacqueline McNeil, a teacher in the Highland Park, MI school system.

Mr. Speaker, these biographical facts cannot begin to convey the many contributions of Perry Johnson to his union, the working men and women he has represented and, in the larger sense, the people of southeastern Michigan through his involvement in political, economic, and social activities. His contributions have been many. It is my pleasure to join his many friends in southeastern Michigan in wishing Perry Johnson the very best as he prepares to begin his well-deserved retirement.

IN HONOR OF LEROY J. THORPE, JR.

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise to honor Leroy J. Thorpe, Jr., who has been elected as an advisory neighborhood commissioner in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Thorpe and his family are well-known to me and my office. He was born in Beacon, in my congressional district of New York and graduated from Beacon High School in 1975. His mother, Margaret Thorpe, lives in Glenham, NY.

The advisory neighborhood commission serves as a line of communication between the residents and the government of the District of Columbia on issues including safety, zoning, and sanitation. Mr. Thorpe has started a 2-year term on the commission representing the Shaw Community—area 2C07. He has been actively involved in efforts to combat drug abuse.

He works in the D.C. Department of Human Services and serves as a board member on the Shaw Project Area Committee and as a member of the First District Police Citizens Advisory Council.

Mr. Speaker, I wish Mr. Thorpe well in his endeavors.

FLORIO HAILS 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF TRENTON BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, on February 15, 1989, the birthday of suffragette Susan B. Anthony, I took the opportunity to call for passage of Federal legislation that would advance the interests of women and their families by setting minimum standards for day care centers, provide incentives for expanded child care services, and improve parental and medical leave policies. Today, I continue in this effort by bringing to the attention of my colleagues an organization in New Jersey, the Trenton Business and Professional Women's Club, that has been in the forefront of the issues facing women in the work force since its founding in 1914.

In April 1916, the Trenton BPW adopted its constitution and 3 years later assisted in the formation of the first State federation in the country. Throughout the first decade and beyond, the club committed itself to an increased awareness of legislation—at all levels of government—that affected women and the family. From the outset, it was the express purpose of the club to impact upon the societal standards, laws, and opinions in a positive manner for businesswomen. Most notable among the many accomplishments the club has witnessed is that of its founder, Emma Dillion, whose efforts were successful in having a clause inserted into the 1947 State constitution which prohibited discrimination between the sexes.

Our Nation has certainly come a long way since the early battles and struggles of Emma Dillion and the Trenton Business and Professional Women's Club. Yet, we still face many difficult challenges in the years ahead as the economic landscape changes. More and more women are moving into the work force—in the last 30 years, the number of women in the work force grew by 178 percent—and more than half of these individuals are working mothers.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the many initiatives of the Trenton BPW not only show compassion and understanding of the issues, they also display good economic sense. I look forward, with great enthusiasm, to working with this organization in the times ahead so as to ensure the Nation takes the needed steps to boost the productivity of its work force. I ask that my colleagues join me in extending congratulations as the Trenton BPW celebrates its 75th anniversary.

TRIBUTE TO HILLSBORO HIGH SCHOOL BOYS BASKETBALL TEAM

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honor to inform my colleagues of the success of the Hillsboro High School Boys Basketball Team. While perfection is something for which we all strive, it has been achieved in my hometown. The Indians have finished the regular season with an unblemished record of 20 wins and no defeats, thus winning the South Central Ohio League Championship and for the first time in their history the coveted Gold Basketball Award for a perfect season.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues in the Congress to join with me in saluting the parents, teachers, students, and most notably the members and staff of the Hillsboro basketball team who through hard work, commitment, and shear desire have achieved the ultimate reward, pefection.

It is with great pleasure, I enclose the names of the young men who have done so much in instilling pride and community spirit to the great city of Hillsboro, OH:

TRIBUTE TO MILWAUKEE CHAPTER OF THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to honor the Milwaukee chapter for the National Organization of Women on the justly celebrated occasion of their 20th anniversary.

The Milwaukee chapter of NOW has distinguished itself through its dedication to the advancement and acknowledgment of women's rights. Its goals have remained consistent through the years, including support of the equal rights amendment, support of a woman's right to choose, and the goal of electing more women to office. It is a fitting tribute to NOW's work that many of the early radical issues of the movement have become realities today, firmly integrated into society, and taken for granted.

NOW, both locally and nationally, was founded by a group of visionary women. Wisconsin has a strong feminist history, and is proud to include local and national NOW founders Catherine Conroy and Kathryn Clarenbach among the ranks of its famous daughters. Catherine Conroy's involvement ranged from women and labor concerns, to reproductive freedom, education, and politics. In 1976 she was named the Milwaukee NOW's first "Woman of the Year." While Catherine Con-roy's recent death is sorely grieved, her vast accomplishments and indefatigable spirit are celebrated, and will live on in the women's movement.

The Milwaukee chapter of NOW has been instrumental in affecting many of the historic changes in our Milwaukee community. Their efforts have helped integrate clubs, schools, and restaurants. Milwaukee NOW has been instrumental in the formation of women's support groups, such as the Women's Crisis Line, Sexual Assault Treatment Center, and the Women's Study Program at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

Task forces, the backbone of Milwaukee NOW's organization, continue to significantly contribute to the legislative processes affecting women's lives. Their research and work continues to provide both voters and legislators with necessary information on specific issues.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to honor the Milwaukee chapter of the National Organization for Women on their 20th anniversary.

BULGARIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS

OF OHIO

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 111th anniversary of Bulgarian Independence Day. On March 3, 1878, the Treaty of San Stefano granted Bulgaria her long-awaited independence from the Ottoman empire.

From the 14th century Bulgaria had been under Turkish domination. A Bulgarian national resistance movement was responsible for a series of uprisings which eventually led to national independence. Russia aided Bulgaria in obtaining her freedom from the Ottoman empire.

Under this long-awaited freedom Bulgaria thrived as an independent nation. Bulgarians were free for the first time in centuries to express their individuality as a nation and as a people. However, their taste of freedom was short-lived. Sixty-five years later, in September 1941, the country that once helped them obtain freedom, Russia brutally took it away.

The Soviet Union incorporated Bulgaria into its colonial empire at the end of World War II. As a result of Russian repression Bulgarian resistance movements sprung up all over the country in desperate attempts to regain their freedom. Once again, thousands of Bulgarians lost their lives and were imprisoned in their struggle for freedom and independence.

Today Bulgaria is still governed under a repressive Communist government. Bulgarians are still deprived of all their rights. They are spiritually impoverished and morally degraded. The economy is bankrupt. The system is not working. Total failure of the system seems to be the only hope the Bulgarian resistance movement has. Bulgarians all over the world long to see the day when their small but glorious nation will once again return to a land of freedom and liberty.

Let us not forget their struggle for the precious rights and freedoms we hold so dear. Bulgarians all over the world must know that we support them and recognize their right for independence.

"WASHINGTON TO WASHINGTON" WOMAN'S ART EXHIBIT

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, at a time in our Nation's history when the enormous talents and achievements of women in politics, science, business, and in literature are receiving much deserved recognition, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the opening of a fine arts exhibition which features Washington State women artists. "Washington to Washington, Women in Art Today" will preview March 6–30, 1989, at the Art Museum of Washington State University and then continue on to Washington, DC, to be displayed at the prestigious, new National Museum of Women in the Arts from May 30–July 9. I encourage my colleagues to visit this exhibition.

A group of 15 of the most extraordinarily gifted female artists currently living and working in the State of Washington were selected to offer samples of their work to be shown in the "Washington to Washington" exhibit.

These women have made remarkable contributions in a wide variety of fine art fields from glass blowing by Sonja Blomdahl and tapestry by Inge Norgaard to computer-produced graphic art by Lorna Pauley Jordan. Many of these artists have had their work exhibited abroad in Europe, Japan, the Soviet Union, and Mexico in addition to exhibitions in several United States cities including New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia.

I would like to express my great appreciation for the contributions made by the artists whose work is to be shown in the "Washington to Washington" exhibit. I offer my sincere congratulations to each of the 15 talented artists.

PLASTICS IN THE WASTE STREAM

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER

OF NEW YORK

Monday, March 6, 1989

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the subject of plastics in the waste stream and how the Federal Government can work with industry to resolve our Nation's garbage crisis.

THE CRISIS

Make no mistake about it, the United States faces a serious garbage crisis. The primary method of solid waste management in the United States, landfilling, will soon be unavailable in some areas of the country. This is painfully apparent in coastal and urban communities. Over 3,000 municipal landfills in the United States have closed since 1983 and by 1993, one-third of those that remain will be closed as well, according to estimates by the Environmental Protection Agency. The prospects for siting new landfills are not good, considering the rising costs of environmental compliance and the growing "not-in-my-backyard" attitude toward new dumps. Clearly, we as a nation are running out of places to hide our waste.

This problem is particularly acute in my area of Long Island. Under New York State law, all public landfills on Long Island must close permanently next year. That law was enacted in order to protect our ground water aquifer—the sole source of drinking water for the 2.7 million people of Nassau and Suffolk Counties. In order to comply with the looming 1990 landfill moratorium, my constituents are experimenting with a host of solid waste technologies including waste reduction, recycling, and composting.

Exporting garbage to other States has been New York State's least risky solid waste disposal solution. Last year, 1.1 million tons of trash from New York were trucked to Midwestern landfills, a 44-percent increase over the amount of trash the State exported in 1986. While perhaps effective in the short term, this pass-the-buck approach to waste management is becoming prohibitively expensive due to sky-rocketing "tipping fees" charged by garbage carters. It is also being met by a growing tide of resistance in America's heartland.

Plastics have been identified in the public's mind as a key culprit in the garbage crisis. Plastic wastes are more visible than some other materials, especially on our roadsides and beaches. While plastic wastes make up about 7 percent of the municipal waste stream by weight, they contribute a significantly greater proportion by volume. And the contribution of nonbiodegradable wastes to the municipal solid waste stream is growing all the time.

An environmental problem that has received congressional attention is plastic wastes adrift at sea. These wastes cause the death by entanglement of hundreds of thousands of seabirds and many marine mammals each year. To attack this problem, Congress enacted the Plastic Pollution Research and Control Act. This measure, signed by President Reagan in December 1987, outlaws ocean dumping of plastic garbage anywhere in the world by American ships, and by foreign vessels within 200 miles of our coasts. Clearly, plastic was a key constituent of the wastes washing up on Long Island beaches last summer.

RESOURCE RECOVERY

Before my election to Congress, I chaired the Resource Recovery Subcommittee of the New York State Assembly for 8 years while representing the 4th Assembly District. My research at the State level showed that a program combining recycling, composting, and waste-to-energy technologies offers the best comprehensive solution to the garbage crisis. Manufacturers using glass, paper, metal, and plastics recognize the great benefits of recycling in terms of lower material costs, smaller energy inputs and fewer environmental impacts. The chief obstacle to expanded industry recycling efforts appears to be the uncertainty of economic markets for recyclable materials. I believe that as more investments are made by industry and government into promoting recycling, however, prices for recycled materials will become more competitive with prices for virgin materials.

One public misconception is that plastic wastes are intrinsically nonrecyclable. Frankly, I believe that perception exists because the plastics industry and government agencies have not done enough to prove otherwise. Industry and government must invest more into both implementing plastics recycling technologies and educating the public about the recyclability of plastics.

BIODEGRADABILITY AND LITTER

The persistence of plastics in the environment is a legitimate concern for government and industry when one considers the litter problem—magnified by last summer's beach washups—together with declining landfill capacity. While efforts to ban plastics may be unrealistic, there is growing interest in requiring degradability of plastics. Several Members of Congress—notably Senator JOHN GLENN, of Ohio—have sponsored bills requiring that many new products be wrapped in biodegradable or photodegradable packaging. I believe that, if degradation technologies can be demonstrated to work, and if they do not contaminate the environment, we ought to consider advancing these technologies in order to deal with the most uncontrollable segment of the waste stream, namely litter.

RECYCLING VERSUS DEGRADABILITY

A major issue that needs to be resolved centers on the appropriate management techniques for individual plastic items in the waste stream. That issue is recyclability versus degradability. I believe that, for each individual consumer product packaged in plastic, consideration should be given as to whether it is feasible to reuse or recycle that packaging into something else, or whether it cannot be recycled and ought to be programmed to decay in the environment over a reasonable period of time.

Of course, the quality that has made plastic so desirable in consumer product packaging is its durability. Plastic packaging does not become soggy and fall apart when wet, like paper. It doesn't become rusty when wet as do some metals, or rotten as does untreated wood. And of course, a plastic container doesn't shatter when it is dropped. Clearly, the plastics industry's point of view is that manufacturers would like to continue producing durable plastic consumer products in the future. Therefore, in my judgment, reuse and recyling should be the key to the industry's strategy. Of course, pursuing such a strategy will require greater investment of resources by the industry into product designs, marketing analyses, and technologies that will advance recycling and reuse.

A COMPREHENSIVE FEDERAL SOLUTION

Last year I introduced the Recyclable Materials Science and Technology Development Act, the first comprehensive recycling bill ever offered at the Federal level. On January 4, I reintroduced this legislation as H.R. 500. The bill launches a coordinated public-private sector effort to open markets across the Nation for recycled materials and assist industry in developing innovative recycling technologies for most nondurable consumer products. The bill requires that, after 5 years of federally sponsored research and development, most nondurable consumer goods must be recycled. Products for which a recycling program is infeasible must be sold in packaging that will decay naturally and safely in the environment over a relatively short time period.

First of all, following the enactment of H.R. 500, the U.S. Commerce Department is directed to establish an Office of Recycling Research and Information. This office will make grants to support development of innovative recycling techniques for all types of consumer product packaging and distribute information to industry about state-of-the-art recycling technologies. Since plastics recycling does not have the history of implementation that exists for paper, glass, and metal recycling, the Office of Recycling Research and Information should be of benefit to the plastics industry. This office will also provide information to public schools, State and local governments, and the general public regarding the garbage crisis and the benefits of instituting recycling programs. This kind of public education campaign will be essential to persuading people to cooperate with recycling efforts.

Within 6 months after enactment, the U.S. Department of Agriculture is required to establish a pilot project to demonstrate the viability of composting municipal solid wastes and sewage sludge. Composting is an age-old technology that could have valuable applications in confronting the garbage crisis. Traditional plastics and other nonbiodegradable wastes can be separated from compost during the process, and this noncompostable waste can subsequently be recycled into plastic lumber for fence posts, docking, et cetera. An initial report to Congress by the Agriculture Department on the composting pilot project is due 1 year after enactment.

H.R. 500 directs that, within 2 years after enactment, the Commerce Department and the Environmental Protection Agency will recommend to Congress the following:

First, how to ensure the development of technologies for recycling nondurable consumer product packaging;

Second, how to expand marketing of products made of recycled materials;

Third, how to encourage the development of certain consumer products that are biodegradable; and Fourth, whether nonrecyclable goods should bear warning labels to remind consumers about the garbage crisis.

The legislation also requires that after 2 years, plastic six-pack rings, shopping bags and fast-food packaging must be degradable. Since I originally wrote the bill, the six-pack ring requirement has been mandated by Congress under a separate law. A major concern with six-pack rings is entanglement of wildlife.

While reuse of bags should be encouraged, plastic shopping bags will be difficult to recover from trash for a recycling program. Therefore, my bill requires that these bags be biodegradable. In the best of all possible worlds, shoppers would stop using disposable bags altogether and use string bags or some other reusable product. However, that change would be difficult to institute nationwide.

Fast-food packaging presents a litter problem due to the prevalence of drive-thru service and roadside dining. Therefore, the legislation requires biodegradability or photodegradability in this packaging. It may be, however, that recycling efforts could capture some of the waste from fast food franchises. That question needs further study, and I know McDonalds Corp. is working to recycle waste from several of its New York outlets. I look forward to reviewing their findings.

Also to be received by Congress 2 years after enactment of H.R. 500 is an analysis by the Secretary of Health and Human Services of the feasibility of recycling or using biodegradable materials in medical supplies. It may be that plastic hospital wastes can be sanitized and recycled into new items, rather than incinerated. On the other hand, it might be possible to manufacture a plastic syringe that will decay in sea water—before it gets a chance to wash up on Long Island's beaches.

And one final anaylsis is to be transmitted to Congress within 2 years. The Secretary of Defense will report on the Pentagon's waste management practices, and comment as to whether a waste recycling program could be instituted for Defense Department facilities—such as cafeterias or aircraft carriers.

Within 4 years after enactment of H.R. 500, the Commerce Secretary and the EPA Administrator will divide nondurable consumer goods into two categories: First, those for which a recycling program is feasible; and second, those which will be exempt from any recycling requirement due to the infeasibility of recycling. Products identified as exempt from the recycling requirement must after 5 years be composed of biodegradable materials.

The two lists generated by EPA and Commerce—one of recyclables and the other of degradables—are by no means coequal. Recycling is the central focus of this legislation, and we can expect that most of the nondurable consumer product waste stream would fall into the mandatory recycling category. Certain items, however, that are found to be either too small to easily separate from trash—cellophane wrap, for example, might fall into this category—or too objectionable to sort by hand—diapers, for example. These items will have to be composed of biodegradable materials after 5 years.

Effective 5 years after enactment, H.R. 500 requires that those products identified by the Commerce Secretary as recyclable must be recycled. Furthermore, the bill requires that these items be recycled at a rate of 75 percent of production. Clearly, that is a high rate. By comparison, the State of New York has set a goal of 50 percent recycling, which is the rate claimed to have already been achieved by Japan. The Federal EPA has set a goal of 25 percent recycling nationwide, and President Bush has pledged to try to exceed that goal. While a rate of 75 percent may be described by some as impossible to achieve, I don't think it hurts to set our sites high. Indeed, manufacturers of some aluminum products have a goal of achieving total recycling.

In order to ensure compliance, H.R. 500 assigns civil and criminal penalties for violators of the act, with fines to be levied by the Administrator of EPA. This is similar to the arrangement under the Federal pesticide law.

Civil penalties would be $5,000 maximum, and a criminal violation could result in a $25,000 fine, a year in jail, or both. Thus, the bill has "teeth" that are designed to guarantee compliance nationwide.

To review the basic schedule for actions required under this legislation, I offer the following abbreviated timetable:

H.R. 500 PROGRAM SCHEDULE

Enactment by month 6: Commerce opens office of recycling research and info ($10 million in grants). USDA starts composting project.

Enactment by year 1: USDA reports on composting.

Enactment by year 2: Commerce reports on: recycling, degradables, and product warning labels. Commerce requires degradability in 6-pack rings, shopping bags and fast food packaging. HHS reports on medical supplies. Defense reports on DOD waste management.

Enactment by year 4: Commerce/EPA issue regulations on recyclables and degradables.

Enactment by year 5: Commerce/EPA identify list of mandatory recyclables and degradables. EPA imposes penalties for noncompliance.

I am pleased that Senator ALBERT GORE, the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space, has introduced companion legislation to H.R. 500 in the Senate (S. 201). The backing of Senator GORE and his cosponsors increases the likelihood of action on comprehensive recycling legislation. In the House, H.R. 500 enjoys the bipartisan support of 75 cosponsors.

A ROLE FOR THE PLASTICS INDUSTRY

I have urged the plastics industry to address the question of degradability versus recyclability. There is no doubt in my mind that—unless EPA discovers significant environmental problems created by degradable plastics—there will continue to be great interest in promoting degradables. I prefer a strategy that emphasizes recycling for plastics and all other materials, with biodegradability required selectively to help cope with litter. I have asked the plastics industry to investigate options for postconsumer separation of degradable plastics from nondegradable plastics. Given the claim that the presence of degradable plastics contaminates a batch of plastics destined for recycling, development of separation methods is very important.

Successfully recycling our Nation's waste will require a much greater investment by industry into product design modifications and potential new lines of remanufactured products. It also will require greater investment by Government into innovative programs for recovering waste and into efforts to change consumers' attitudes and behavior patterns. We're all in this mess together, and we will need to work together to get out of it.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, March 7, 1989, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED

9:30 a.m.

Commerce, Science, and Transportation
To hold hearings on the Mission to Planet Earth program, focusing on activities to define, organize, and implement the proposed mission.
SR-253

Energy and Natural Resources
Business meeting, to review those programs which fall within the committee's jurisdiction as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990 with a view towards making its recommendations to the Committee on the Budget, and to consider S. 406, to establish and implement a competitive oil and gas leasing program for the Coastal Plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, Alaska.
SD-366

Rules and Administration
To hold oversight hearings on the operations of the Office of the Senate Sergeant at Arms and the Office of the Architect of the Capitol.
SR-301

10:00 a.m.

Appropriations
Agriculture and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Department of Agriculture.
SD-192

Appropriations
Treasury, Postal Service, General Government Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Department of the Treasury, focusing on the Financial Management Service, Bureau of Public Debt, U.S. Mint, Office of the Inspector General, and the U.S. Savings Bond Division.
SD-116

Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs
To continue oversight hearings to examine the problems in the savings and loan industry.
SD-538

Budget
To resume hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1990 budget, focusing on the Department of Health and Human Services.
SD-608

Finance
To continue hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal year 1990 for the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, and the International Trade Commission.
SD-215

Foreign Relations
Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations Subcommittee
To hold hearings to review foreign terrorists' threats relating to attempts to prevent publication and distribution of the Satanic Verses in the United States.
SD-419

Labor and Human Resources
Business meeting, to consider S. 4, to restore the minimum wage to a fair and equitable rate, and pending nominations.
SD-430

1:30 p.m.

Budget
To continue hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1990 budget, focusing on the Medicare program.
SD-608

4:30 p.m.

Veterans' Affairs
Business meeting, to consider the Veterans Administration proposed budget request for fiscal year 1990.

MARCH 9

9:30 a.m.

Labor and Human Resources
To hold hearings on proposals to establish a corporation to administer a program of voluntary national service, and to provide for the education and training of participants in such Corps, including S. 3, S. 408, S. 322, and S. 382.
SD-430

Special on Aging
To hold joint hearings with the House Select Committee on Aging's Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care and the Subcommittee on Housing and Consumer Interests on residential board and care facilities.

10:00 a.m.

Appropriations
To resume hearings on the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990.
SD-192

Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs
To contnue oversight hearings to examine the problems in the savings and loan industry.
SD-538

Budget
To continue hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1990 budget, focusing on science, technology, and strategic economic policy.
SD-608

Finance
To hold hearings on revenue increases as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990.
SD-215

Judiciary
Business meeting, to consider the nomination of William J. Bennett, of North Carolina, to be Director of National Drug Control Policy, S. 419, to provide for the collection of data about crimes motivated by race, religion, ethnicity, or sexual orientation, and S. 431, to authorize funding for the Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday.

1:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Transportation Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Urban Mass Transportation Administration and the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority.

2:00 p.m.
Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry
To resume hearings on exchange trading practices in the commodity futures markets.
SR-332

Armed Services
Defense Industry and Technology Subcommittee
To hold hearings on the implications of the FS-X Aircraft Agreement between the United States and Japan.
SR-253

Labor and Human Resources
Employment and Productivity Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed legislation to extend employment and training programs for adults and youth.
SD-430

Select on Intelligence
To hold closed hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for the intelligence community.
SH-219

3:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Labor, Health and Human Services, Education Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Department of Labor.

MARCH 10

9:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Labor, Health and Human Services, Education Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for ACTION, Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services, National Mediation Board, Railroad Retirement Board, Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission, National Labor Relations Board, and the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

9:30 a.m.
Joint Economic
To hold hearings on the employment-unemployment situation for February.
2359 Rayburn Building

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Treasury, Postal Service, General Government Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Postal Service.
SD-116

Armed Services
Projection Forces and Regional Defense Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal years 1990 and 1991 for the Department of Defense, focusing on the state and capabilities of the Marine Corps for special operations and low intensity conflict.
SR-222

10:30 a.m.
Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs
To continue oversight hearings to examine the problems in the savings and loan industry.

9:30 a.m.
Finance
International Trade Subcommittee
To hold hearings to examine the relationship between bilateral trade agreements and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and the potential for bilateral arrangements to address U.S. trade problems.
SD-215

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Interior Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Energy Information Administration, Economic Regulatory Administration, Office of Hearings and Appeals, and Emergency Preparedness, all of the Department of Energy.
S-128, Capitol

Appropriations
Military Construction Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for Air Force and Defense Agencies military construction programs.

1:30 p.m.
Appropriations
HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation, National Institute of Building Sciences, and the National Credit Union Administration.
SD-138

Appropriations
Interior Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Minerals Management Service, and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, both of the Department of the Interior.
S-128, Capitol

2:00 p.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
Consumer Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for the Consumer Product Safety Commission.
SR-253

9:30 a.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
Aviation Subcommittee
To hold hearings on S. 341, to prohibit discrimination against blind individuals in air travel.
SR-253

Energy and Natural Resources
To hold hearings on energy efficiency and renewable energy technologies as they relate to S. 324, National Energy Policy Act of 1989.

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Agriculture and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Department of Agriculture, focusing on Agricultural Research Service, Cooperative State Research Service, and Extension Service.
SD-138

Appropriations
Interior Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Indian Health Service of the Department of Health and Human Services, and Indian education programs.
S-128, Capitol

Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs
To resume oversight hearings to examine the problems in the savings and loan industry.
SD-538

Finance
To resume hearings on revenue increases as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990.
SD-215

Judiciary
Technology and the Law Subcommittee
To hold hearings on computer viruses.
SD-226

1:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Transportation Subcommittee
To hold hearings on aviation security issues.

MARCH 15

9:00 a.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
Communications Subcommittee
To hold hearings on the proposed Fairness in Broadcasting Act of 1989.
SR-253

9:30 a.m.
Appropriations
Foreign Operations Subcommittee
To hold hearings to review U.S. foreign assistance programs.
SD-138

Appropriations
Treasury, Postal Service, General Government Subcommittee
To hold hearings proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board, Office of Special Counsel, General Services Administration, and the Office of the Inspector General, General Services Administration.
SD-116

Energy and Natural Resources
Business meeting, to resume consideration of S. 406, to establish and implement a competitive oil and gas leasing program for the Coastal Plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), Alaska, and other pending calendar business.
SD-366

Governmental Affairs
To hold hearings on the proposed Federal Advisory Committee Act Amendments of 1989.
SD-342

10:00 a.m.
Finance
To continue hearings on revenue increases as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990.
SD-215
Judiciary
Constitution Subcommittee
To hold hearings on DNA identification.

MARCH 16

9:30 a.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee
To resume hearings to review the President's proposed budget request for fiscal year 1990 and 1991 for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, focusing on space station programs.
SR-253
Veterans' Affairs
To hold oversight hearings on veterans' health care issues.
SR-418

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Agriculture and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Department of Agriculture, focusing on Food and Nutrition Service and Human Nutrition Information Service.
SD-124
Appropriations
HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Consumer Product Safety Commission, Office of Consumer Affairs, and the Consumer Information Center.
SD-116
Appropriations
Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Administration, Department of Justice.
S-146, Capitol
Appropriations
Transportation Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration and the Research and Special Programs Administration.
SD-138
Finance
To continue hearings on revenue increases as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990.
SD-215
Foreign Relations
To hold hearings to review the international environmental agenda for the 101st Congress.
SD-419

2:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Foreign Operations Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for development assistance programs.
SD-138
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
To hold hearings in conjunction with the National Ocean Policy Study on global climate change and ocean perspective.
SR-253

MARCH 17

9:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Labor, Health and Human Services, Education Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1990 for Physician Payment Review Commission, Corporation for Public Broadcasting, National Commission on Libraries, U.S. Institute of Peace, National Commission on Financing Post Secondary Education, National Commission on Migrant Education, National Commission on Infant Mortality, U.S. Bipartisan Commission on Comprehensive Health Care Prospective Payment Review Commission, and the Soldiers' and Airmen's Home.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, March 7, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

In this our prayer, gracious God, we remember our colleagues, our friends, our families, and we pray that Your blessing will be upon them. May Your good spirit of renewal touch the lives of all who have any special need, give solace to those who suffer any hurt, give courage to those who are alone, grant forgiveness to all who have missed the mark, and allow Your peace to touch each of us in the depths, of our hearts and souls. This we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. INHOFE] kindly lead our colleagues in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. INHOFE led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

TWO BLACK HEROES FROM WORLD WAR I AND WORLD WAR II HONORED POSTHUMOUSLY

(Mr. McNULTY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, recently, my colleagues Mr. LELAND and Mr. HUNTER joined with me in introducing a resolution calling for long delayed recognition of two deceased war heroes, Henry Johnson and Dorrie Miller. It is our hope that the Departments of the Army and the Navy will recognize the valor of these gentlemen and will award each a posthumous Congressional Medal of Honor.

Sergeant Johnson and Seaman Miller were black veterans in World War I and World War II respectively. Sergeant Johnson served in the 369th Infantry in France during World War I and was a native of Albany, NY. Seaman Miller was a mess steward in the Navy and was from Waco, TX.

During World War I, Sergeant Johnson was stationed in France. One night, while at an observation post, he and a companion were attacked by 12 Germans. Despite severe wounds, Sergeant Johnson killed four of the enemy, captured a stockpile of enemy munitions, and rescued his wounded comrade. For his actions, the French awarded him the Croix De Guerre, citing his "magnificent example of courage and energy."

Sergeant Johnson never fully recovered from the injuries he sustained in the attack. He died in 1929.

Seaman Miller survived the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor, where he helped remove his mortally wounded captain from the ship's bridge. Despite not having received combat training.

He returned to the U.S.S. West Virginia, where he manned a machinegun against the attackers. He later perished in the Pacific theater during a 1943 torpedo attack. An American warship was later named in his honor.

Mr. Speaker, we are asking that the respective services waive the time limitations on the issuance of the Congressional Medal of Honor for these most deserving individuals.

What is at issue here is racial discrimination. Out of the 3,413 recipients of the medal, only 76, or 2.2 percent, are black. Sadder still is the fact that during both world wars, not one black service man or woman received the Medal of Honor for their actions.

Surely, this is no mere coincidence. Former Secretary of Defense Carlucci has stated that:

It is clear that unjust discrimination existed during World Wars I and II that could well have extended to individual decisions leading to the awarding of medals in recognition of heroic actions.

I urge my colleagues to support our efforts to award the Congressional Medal of Honor to these two American heroes.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION WOULD ELIMINATE ALL TAXATION ON SALE OF A RESIDENCE

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, as the debate over capital gains taxation rages in many corners of America, including the Congress, its committees and outside these hallowed Halls, one voice must not be forgotten—the voice of the American homeowner.

The saying that a person's home is his castle is true in our Nation today. Tax policy, however, does not fully recognize the sacrifices one makes to maintain that castle. Hard work, many repairs and home improvements are typical investments Americans make in their property. Investments in stability, savings and, yes, retirement. In many cases though, when we sell our homes, inflation and taxes take much of this work and investment away.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to simplify and correct the flaws in taxing the sale of a principal residence. My bill would eliminate all taxation on the sale of a residence and reward the best investment American families make in their lives—buying a home to live in.

RAIL LINE WORK STOPPAGE WOULD ADD TO NATION'S TRANSPORTATION WOES

(Mrs. LOWEY of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's transportation network is in jeopardy.

The Eastern Airlines strike has already inconvenienced thousands of air travelers. But a much more serious disruption of our transportation network may be only hours away.

At 3 p.m. tomorrow, a temporary restraining order preventing a disruption of service on New York's commuter rail lines will expire. When the restraining order expires, rail lines serving 365,000 New York area residents will grind to a halt, creating utter chaos for commuters. Other major metropolitan areas around the Nation face a similar plight.

President Bush has thus far refused to appoint an emergency board to help resolve the dispute. I call on him to reverse that decision now so commuters in Westchester County and elsewhere are not left stranded for their homebound commutes tomorrow evening. If the President refuses to cooperate, I believe that Congress must act to mandate that he appoint an emergency board. I have joined as a cosponsor of legislation to accomplish this, and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

We cannot stand by as hundreds of thousands of commuters are threatened by the administration's inaction.

H.R. 373, THE DECEPTIVE MAILINGS PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

(Mr. SMITH of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my concerns about the disturbing problem of deceptive and misleading direct mail.

Often, mail solicitations are blatant attempts to resemble official Government correspondence. They may offer, for a fee, assistance in obtaining Government benefits, Social Security cards, records, or other information and services that are provided free through Federal Government agencies.

Senior citizens in particular are frequent targets of such schemes. For them the implied government affiliation can be all too compelling. By taking advantage of seniors' fears and anxieties about the security of their retirement benefits, direct mail companies have reaped huge profits in exchange for unnecessary services.

For this reason I urge your support of H.R. 373, the Deceptive Mailings Prevention Act, introduced by my colleagues OLYMPIA SNOWE, this bill prohibits sending such misleading mail without clear statements disclaiming government affiliation.

The 101st Congress must crack down on these deceptive practices. The proposed disclaimer will be an effective step and should be enacted without delay. I urge those who have not already cosponsored H.R. 373 to lend their support to this needed legislation.

NAACP OPPOSES GAS TAX FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION

(Mr. ANDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in support of House Resolution 41. This resolution, which has more than 165 cosponsors, expresses the sense of the House of Representatives that Federal excise taxes on gasoline and diesel fuels not be increased for deficit reduction purposes. The NAACP letter makes many persuasive points, especially the fact that such an increase would hit hardest the poor, those with large families and those living in rural and suburban areas.

Mr. Speaker, I submit for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the NAACP letter, as well as the current list of cosponsors for House Resolution 41.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE
Baltimore, MD, February 16, 1989.

Hon. GLENN M. ANDERSON,
Chairman, Public Works and Transportation, U.S. House of Representatives, Rayburn Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN ANDERSON: I am writing to express my support for the recent House Resolution 41, expressing the sense of the House that the Federal excise taxes on gasoline diesel fuel should not be increased to reduce the Federal deficit.

The NAACP is concerned about recent proposals to increase the federal gasoline tax in an attempt to help balance the federal budget deficit. It is my hope that you will consider the following concerns and work against the passage of this very regressive tax.

The NAACP opposes the recent proposals to raise the gasoline tax because of both its direct and indirect adverse impacts upon the poor. A gasoline tax would have a disproportionately adverse impact on the poor, especially those living in rural areas. Those with lower incomes spend a significantly greater percentage of their income on motor fuel taxes than those with higher incomes. For example, a recent study by the Congressional Budget Office points out that gasoline expenditures as a fraction of income fall sharply as income rises. The study shows that the lowest income group, under $5,000, currently pays more than 7 times as much as does the highest income group, above $50,000.

In addition, raising the gasoline tax for general government programs rather than as a user charge would be particularly unfair to individuals and families living in less densely populated areas where people must drive longer distances to work, church and to meet their other needs. Similarly, larger families consistently spend a higher proportion of their income on gasoline than do smaller families. In short, increasing the gasoline tax would hit hardest the poor, large families and those living in rural and suburban areas.

Finally, to the extent that a gasoline tax will negatively impact car sales, that will lead to a corresponding negative impact on jobs. Many of those job losses could impact members of the minority community.

Once again I want to express our support for House Resolution 41 and, to encourage you to continue to oppose this regressive tax.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN L. HOOKS,
Executive Director.

ADVANTAGES OF EARNED INCOME TAX CREDIT REFORM OVER MINIMUM WAGE INCREASE

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, nobody seems to be talking about the totally predictable budget effects of raising the minimum wage. But last year the Council of Economic Advisers estimated that raising the minimum wage to $4.65 per hour would add $2 to $6 billion per year to the Federal budget deficit.

The cost to American business would be somewhere between $20 and $70 billion per year.

There's a better way to help the working poor: Reform the earned income tax credit and vary it for family size.

This is what I have proposed through my Family Living Wage Act.

By supplementing the incomes of the working poor, we can target the aid directly to those who need it.

My proposal would increase the current EITC by $7 billion. Of this, $4 billion would be financed by repealing the dependent care credit, which goes mainly to higher income families and is unfair to those who do not pay other people to take care of their children.

By helping people to get off welfare through EITC reform, my proposal's real cost would be well below $3 billion.

It is a good deal, Mr. Speaker.

My Family Living Wage Act provides more help for those who need it without the inflation and destruction of jobs which would come with a hike in the minimum wage.

LEGISLATION TO GIVE PERMANENT RESIDENT STATUS TO ALIEN MEMBERS OF U.S. ARMED FORCES

(Mr. PICKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to make it easier for members of our Armed Forces who are not U.S. citizens to gain permanent resident status in order to become U.S. citizens. Aliens who served in our Armed Forces prior to October 15, 1978, were given this special status by Executive order in recognition of their honorable service on active duty.

Although they can still enlist, alien service members have, since 1978, found it more difficult to become U.S. citizens and to advance into military positions requiring U.S. citizenship.

My bill would correct this. It would grant permanent resident status to alien service members who serve honorably on active duty for 12 years, or who serve honorably on active duty for 6 years and reenlist for 6 additional years. These criteria were suggested by the Department of the Navy.

In this century, thousands of Filipinos and other foreign nationals have, as members of our Armed Forces, fought heroically, side by side with Americans, to defend freedom, and they continue to make valuable contributions in our Armed Forces today. This legislation will make it a little easier for these alien service members to become U.S. citizens. It is a fair bill. It is good for our national defense, and I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring it.

UTE INDIAN WATER SETTLEMENT ACT

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself, Mr. HANSEN, and Mr. OWENS of Utah, I would like to introduce the Ute Indian Water Settlement Act. This legislation would attempt to settle all water issues with the Ute Tribe of the Uintah and Quray Reservation of Utah and meet the obligations of the deferral agreement of 1965.

In this agreement the Ute Tribe was promised future water delivery and mitigation in exchange for deferring to the central Utah project, their water rights as affirmed by the Winters doctrine. January 1, 2005, was set as the target date to have completed projects that would satisfy Ute Indian water rights. It is now March 7, 1989, and the tribe is still waiting for some sign of these promises being kept. Last year I introduced legislation to keep these commitments as did my colleague, Mr. OWENS. This year we have combined efforts and are united behind this piece of legislation.

In the past 2 years, there has been a lot of progress made in the relations between the Indians and non-Indians of Utah's Uintah Basin. Passage of a bill meeting the commitments made to the Ute Tribe, in a way that's agreeable to non-Indian water interests as well, would go a long way to furthering this cooperation between them. We have had numerous meetings locally to receive input from both Indians and non-Indians. They are supportive of this bill and hope to see Congress act on it.

I feel that through careful consideration of this legislation and the commitments made to the tribe, we as legislators can pass a bill that will meet the guidelines of Congress and the needs of the people. The direction of the deferral agreement and previous law is clear, all Indian water rights must be satisfied in a timely manner.

There comes a time when promises must move from mere words to decisive action. We believe that this time has come. We hope that Congress will act on the commitment made years ago and show the people of the Ute Tribe that the Government can be relied on by passing this piece of legislation as quickly as possible.

BUSH BUDGET PROPOSES UNACCEPTABLE REDUCTION IN MEDICARE

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the recently released Bush 1990 budget proposal proposes a $5.5 billion reduction in Medicare. In my view, and in the view of many of my colleagues, a reduction of this size is totally unacceptable. Many of the hospitals in my district and across the country are operating at a loss. Specifically, hospital operating margins have fallen from a high of 15 percent in 1983 to zero percent in 1988 and they are expected to continue to drop.

Hospitals have already made substantial contributions to reducing the deficit—Medicare hospital payments have declined from 73 percent of total Medicare spending in 1980 to 65 percent in 1988—by achieving increased efficiencies. A cut of this amount could force hospitals both in rural and urban areas to close. Before we make any further cuts to Medicare we must be absolutely certain that it will not adversely affect the quality of patient care our health care system is delivering to the people of this Nation. For this reason, I support a House resolution stating that Medicare payments to hospitals should not be reduced below levels provided for in current law.

Another case in point are the proposed regulations reducing reimbursement rates for kidney dialysis treatment under Medicare's end stage renal disease program. A reduction in dialysis reimbursement could do great harm to the many ESRD patients in my State of New Mexico and across the country. Dialysis providers have already absorbed two major reimbursement reductions since 1983 without adjustments for inflation.

Since then dialysis patient mortality rates have steadily increased. It is quite probable that reimbursement reductions are affecting the quality of care patients are receiving. These statistics are serious enough that Congress mandated a study to determine the relationship between reimbursement and quality of patient care due in December 1990. We must oppose any further reductions in reimbursement rates for dialysis treatment until this study has been completed and Congress can evaluate it and determine any future steps that may be necessary.

VIOLENCE IN TIBET RAISES QUESTIONS ABOUT ARMS DEALS WITH CHINA

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the violence in Tibet has reached an unprecedented level. During a peaceful and constructive demonstration last weekend, Chinese police opened fire on the demonstrators, including unarmed Tibetan monks and nuns. After the deaths of at least eleven persons with hundreds more injured, Chinese authorities imposed martial law in the Tibetan capital.

Scores of peaceful Tibetans have been arrested and brutally tortured over the years. In addition, journalists, independent human rights monitoring groups, and congressional staff have repeatedly been denied entry into Tibet.

Two weeks ago, China stopped Fang Lizhi, a leading Chinese dissident, from meeting with our President. This week's actions once again demonstrate that China continues to blatantly ignore United States concern for the fundamental freedoms of all people, including Tibetans.

Mr. Speaker, in light of the treatment of Dr. Fang, the violence in Lhasa, and the failure of the Chinese to negotiate in good faith with the Dalai Lama, perhaps we should rethink the United States-People's Republic of China F-8 fighter and artillery arms deals we have concluded with the Chinese and suspend any future arms deals until the Chinese take human rights seriously.

WORKERS, PUBLIC, INDUSTRY ALL HURT BY EASTERN AIRLINES LABOR DISPUTE

(Mr. FEIGHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the standoff between Eastern Airlines and its workers is now entering its 4th day.

Last week, President Bush could have moved to postpone the strike and provide a 60-day cooling-off period. But he didn't. Now, 25,000 employees are out of work, Eastern is losing $1 million a day, and millions of travelers are suffering.

I hope that we do not use this unfortunate event as an opportunity to bash the unions. We should look instead at Eastern's past dealings with its workers. In 1986, Frank Lorenzo bought Eastern airlines and promised to make it whole again. Instead, he squeezed Eastern workers for severe wage concessions.

Lorenzo proposed nearly a half billion dollars in labor cost cuts, sending 3,500 mechanics and ground crew out the door. Mr. Lorenzo's track record is clear. In 1983, he broke the unions at Continental Airlines by forcing the company into bankruptcy. Now he is doing the same at Eastern.

Mr. Speaker, the Eastern workers have done their share in the past. In 1983, they took deep wage cuts in return for promises of future profits. Management never made good on these promises. Who can blame the union now for expecting concrete proof that Lorenzo is not merely planning to strip the airline of all assets in order to make a quick buck?

Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago another President from Texas failed to act as a 6-week strike paralyzed the airline industry. President Bush should learn from President Johnson's mistake and step in to stop this strike. The Eastern workers and the American public deserve this much.

ACCESS DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS CORRECTION

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 678) to make a correction in the Education and Training for a Competitive America Act of 1988.

H.R. 678

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 6142(b) of the Education and Training for a Competitive America Act of 1988 is amended by striking "fiscal year 1988" and inserting "fiscal year 1989 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992".

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DARDEN). Under the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge my colleagues to support H.R. 678.

This is a very simple bill. It merely makes a technical correction to the trade bill that Congress enacted last year.

The conference agreement on the trade bill provided an authorization through fiscal year 1992 for the Access Demonstration Program. This program is designed to expand opportunities for rural high school students whose communities are experiencing significant economic and social changes by providing in service education for teachers, counselors, and school administrators to enable these individuals to give their students better advice concerning education and career choices. When the conference report on the trade bill was finally drafted, this program was authorized for fiscal year 1988 only. H.R. 678 restores the authorization through fiscal year 1992 thereby fulfilling the original intent of the Congress.

This is a noncontroversial bill that I have cosponsored with my colleague from Missouri, TOM COLEMAN, who is also the ranking minority member of the Postsecondary Education Subcommittee. This is a very simple measure needed to correct an error in the trade bill, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today we are considering under suspension of the rules H.R. 678, a bill which makes a correction in the Education and Training for a Competitive America Act of 1988. Identical legislation was passed by the House during the final weeks of the 100th Congress but was not considered by the Senate. This bill has bipartisan support on the Education and Labor Committee. I particularly appreciate the cooperation of Chairman HAWKINS and Mr. WILLIAMS, chairman of the Postsecondary Subcommittee, who also cosponsored H.R. 678, in getting an early resolution of this unfinished legislative business of the last Congress.

H.R. 678 corrects a technical error made in writing the conference report on the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. In the report, the Access Demonstration Programs were inadvertently authorized for only 1 year, fiscal year 1988, rather than for the 4-year period of authorization, beginning in fiscal year 1989 and ending in fiscal year 1992, which was agreed to by both House and Senate conferees.

This bill makes a simple, purely technical change, correcting the drafting error and providing for the full, 4 years of authorization for the Access Demonstration Program which was originally intended.

Access is a vitally needed program which is designed to expand the college, vocational, and career opportunities of rural high school students attending schools in agricultural communities which are encountering fundamental economic and social changes.

Access, now a pilot project in northwestern Missouri, provides in-school support services for counselors, teachers, and school administrators, targeting those rural schools with the greatest need, particularly those serving low-income, disadvantaged students. Access has been successful in involving parents, business, and community leaders, and the resources of the State universities in providing counseling and educational programs for rural high school students.

Again, this legislation is noncontroversial, making only a technical correction to an unintended drafting error. H.R. 678 restores the originally agreed upon 4 years of authorization for this important rural educational program. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of H.R. 678, the Access Demonstration Programs, the enactment of which will correct a technical error made in the writing of the conference report on Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. This bill authorizes the program for 4 years instead of only 1 year, as was agreed to by the House and Senate conferees in the last Congress.

These programs, Mr. Speaker, are designed to expand the college, vocational, and career opportunities for students attending rural high schools in agricultural communities that are experiencing fundamental economic and social changes. Access targets those schools in greatest need, particularly those which serve disadvantaged students.

I can think of no better way to initiate my new membership on the Education and Labor Committee, under the able chairmanship of my colleague from California, Mr. HAWKINS, than to commit my full support to a bill that not only helps foster competitiveness through education, but one which pays special attention to the needs of rural areas. Representing a district, as I do, that is located in one of the most rural States in the Union, nothing could be more appropriate nor more welcome as an opportunity to further the education of high school youths throughout America.

I commend my colleagues, Mr. PAT WILLIAMS of Montana, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, and its ranking minority member THOMAS COLEMAN of Missouri, for taking the initiative and making the technical correction necessary to allow the program to be funded, and to begin to serve the areas and the students intended to be served when Public Law 100–418 was enacted.

I thank the managers of the bill for allowing me this time to speak on behalf of enactment of H.R. 678, and urge my colleages in the House to support its passage today.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have no additional requests for time, and I likewise yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 678.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 148) designating March 1989 as "Women's History Month," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this time in order to give my friend and colleague, the gentlewoman from California [Ms. PELOSI], who is the chief cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 148, designating March 1989 as "Women's History Month," an opportunity to express her thoughts on this legislation to the Chamber.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIDGE. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, today the House will consider House Joint Resolution 148, which I introduced along with my distinguished colleague, Representative OLYMPIA SNOWE. This resolution would proclaim the month of March 1989 as Women's History Month.

Legislation proclaiming Women's History Month has been passed by Congress each session since 1980. This year, Mr. SAWYER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Census and Population, will offer a technical amendment to designate the month of March in both 1989 and 1990 as Women's History Month.

Commemorating Women's History Month provides an opportunity for teachers, historians, administrators, and Members of Congress to educate our children about the contributions women have made to our society: In law, in politics, in sports, in entertainment, in art, in science, and in many other fields. We want to honor and recognize these many accomplishments during Women's History Month.

The theme of this year's Women's History Month is, "Heritage of Strength and Vision." This theme will assist us in bringing attention to the lives of women such as Harriet Tubman and her work as a courageous leader in the underground railroad movement, her dedication to helping black people in her community—and Susan B. Anthony, who led women to the voting polls in 1872—and Clara Barton, who tended our wounded soldiers in the Civil War and then founded the American Red Cross—and Sally Ride, the first American woman astronaut—we are all empowered through their courage, strength, and tenacity.

As a mother of four daughters, I am working to ensure that all doors of opportunity are open to them. The historical struggle for freedom and for women's rights is a source of inspiration and determination for women in the present and in the future.

I ask my distinguished colleagues to join me in celebrating Women's History Month by supporting House Joint Resolution 148.

Mr. RIDGE. Further reserving my right to object, Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague and friend, the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], wanted to be here on the floor to express her thoughts. She was also involved in getting March 1989 designated as Women's History Month. I am sure that she will include a statement for the RECORD.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 148, a bill to proclaim March 1989 as National Women's History Month. I take great pleasure in using this opportunity to offer my endorsement for this legislation, enacted by Congress each year since 1980.

This bill has provided a tradition of honoring the women in our Nation who have gone before us. These women lived out patterns and expectations we have come to know only through the more recent efforts in history and literature to examine their lives.

Significantly, what we as Americans learn about those in our past, the women as well as the men, affects the way we perceive our lives today. The past strengths of American women in their families and communities, the achievements of women in the fields of social outreach, health, education, government, science, and industry, and the expressions of women in the arts and literature have become for us a vital part of our heritage.

The voices of Harriet Tubman, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Sojourner Truth, Mary MacLeod Bethune, Clare Booth Luce, Eleanor Roosevelt, and Margaret Chase Smith provide us with inspiration, direction, and insight for the decisions we make today.

This bill provides histories, teachers, librarians, writers, and Members of Congress a national forum for recognizing the valuable influence the women in our nation's history have had on us all.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of March 1989 as Women's History Month.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WILLIAMS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas American women of every race, class, and ethnic background have made historic contributions to the growth and strength of our Nation in countless recorded and unrecorded ways;

Whereas American women have played and continue to play a critical economic, cultural, and social role in every sphere of the life of the Nation by constituting a significant portion of the labor force working inside and outside of the home;

Whereas American women have played a unique role throughout the history of the Nation by providing the majority of the volunteer labor force of the Nation;

Whereas American women were particularly important in the establishment of early charitable, philanthropic, and cultural institutions in our Nation;

Whereas American women of every race, class, and ethnic background served as early leaders in the forefront of every major progressive social change movement;

Whereas American women have been leaders not only in securing their own rights of suffrage and equal opportunity, but also in the abolitionist movement, the emancipation movement, the industrial labor movement, the civil rights movement, and other movements, especially the peace movement, which create a more fair and just society for all; and

Whereas despite these contributions, the role of American women in history has been consistently overlooked and undervalued in the literature, teaching, and study of American history: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 1989 is designated as "Women's History Month". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. SAWYER

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer several amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. SAWYER: Page 2, line 3, strike out "is" and insert in lieu thereof "and March 1990 are both".

Page 3, line 2, insert "for each of those months" after "proclamation".

Page 3, line 3, strike out "that month" and insert in lieu thereof "those months".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAWYER].

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SAWYER

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. SAWYER: Amend the title so as to read "Joint Resolution designating the month of March in both 1989 and 1990 as 'Women's History Month'.".

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

THE JAMAICAN GENERAL ELECTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, this Member wishes to congratulate the people of Jamaica and their leaders for holding free, fair, and generally nonviolent general elections on February 9, 1989. These elections resulted in the sweeping victory of the People's National Party headed by Michael Manley. This Member extends his best wishes for success to Prime Minister Manley and his new government.

This Member also extends his high regards to former Prime Minister Edward Seaga, who guided Jamaica through major economic reforms during the 1980's.

This year's peaceful elections in Jamaica stand in stark contrast to the last contested general elections in 1980 when violence claimed the lives of over 750 people during the 9-month campaign. At that time, street violence was common, and many voters were intimidated or attacked.

Last year, in an effort to prevent a repeat of 1980, political leaders signed a code of conduct aimed at reducing violence. Although there were a few outbreaks of violence resulting in the deaths of 13 people and some charges of election fraud, observers agree that the candidates and their supporters largely adhered to the code of conduct. The outcome of this election clearly represents the will of the people. All parties are to be commended for taking this unprecedented step to support democracy and freedom in Jamaica.

Although these elections represent a milestone in Jamaican political life, this is not a time for complacency. Under Prime Minister Manley's turbulent leadership from 1972 to 1980, Jamaica established strong diplomatic relations with Cuba, repudiated the country's foreign debt, ended Jamaica's relationship with the International Monetary Fund [IMF] and took a number of hard-left, anti-American stands, both on domestic and international issues. During that time, Prime Minister Manley's policies brought the country to the brink of economic collapse. Not surprisingly, these policies severely strained relations with the United States.

For the past several years, Prime Minister Manley has enunciated a new and more moderate set of policies and has acknowledged that he made mistakes in the past. He said he had learned from his experiences in the 1970's: "The world has evolved, I have evolved." he said.

The reformed Prime Minister Manley said during his campaign that he will honor Jamaica's debt obligations, now amounting to $4 billion, and will seek the most constructive possible relations with the United States. He indicated that he will seek to invigorate the parliamentary process and wishes to work with the opposition Jamaica Labor Party in a bipartisan way.

The most disturbing policy advocated by Prime Minister Manley is the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Cuba. These links were formally broken by the former Prime Minister Seaga in 1982. In an effort to reassure American policymakers, the Prime Minister contended that these ties should not stand in the way of a solid relationship with the United States.

With the exception of reestablishing relations with Cuba, which would seem to be neither necessary nor productive for Jamaica, the essence of Prime Minister Manley's campaign promises and statements is most welcome and would seem to bode well for our future bilateral relationship. It is encouraging that the Prime Minister has pledged that there will be no upheaval in the local economy and that he will strengthen Jamaica's relations with CARICOM—the Caribbean Community.

President Bush sent a congratulatory message to Prime Minister Manley wishing prosperity and progress to Jamaica and expressed the hope that Jamaica and the United States would cooperate on matters of mutual interest, including economic development, mutual security, and combating the scourge of international drug trafficking. The State Department has officially indicated that the United States looks forward to friendly and cooperative relations with Mr. Manley's government. Those were commendatory actions which we in the Congress should recognize.

The United States has much at stake in economic, social, and democratic progress in Jamaica and the other nations of the Caribbean. America has provided $980 million in bilateral assistance to Jamaica since 1980 to foster political stability, economic growth, and respect for democratic values, and Jamaica has substantially benefited from the Caribbean Basin Initiative.

Since 1980, under former Prime Minister Seaga, the Jamaican Government has restored ties to the IMF, reestablished its private sector, encouraged foreign investment and generally adopted sound and sustainable free-market policies. This course of action has been difficult, with economic and hurricane-related setbacks, but it is no secret that Jamaica is a far stronger and more open economy in 1989 than it was just 8 years ago. I know my colleagues in Congress compliment Prime Minister Seaga and Jamaicans on that progress accomplished during a period of tough international economic times; we hope that progress can continue in Jamaica.

Despite Prime Minister Manley's greater professed sympathy to free-market economics in the past few years, I wish to take this opportunity to say that this Member will be watching his performance with great interest. It is important to Jamaicans and Americans that Jamaica does not slip back into the political and economic morass of the 1970's. I am especially concerned that Jamaica's relationship with Cuba does not result, as it did in the seventies, in a close collaboration between Michael Manley's government and Fidel Castro to the detriment of the interests of the United States and our Caribbean friends.

Again, I wish Prime Minister Manley a successful term of office for Jamaica. This Member hopes that relations between our two Governments will continue on their present positive course. In the future, however, Members of Congress must not hesitate to speak out and examine conditions if the situation in Jamaica begins to deteriorate. Prime Minister Manley invited such scrutiny when he said to his skeptics "Watch what I say and watch what I do." America will watch and try to be a supportive and helpful neighbor for a democratic Jamaica.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Acting President pro tempore [Mr. LIEBERMAN].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the Earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? There is no searching of His understanding. He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increaseth strength.—Isaiah 40:28,29.

Gracious God, our loving, Heavenly Father, in this great Senate family we have much for which to be thankful, and we have many needs known and unknown. We thank Thee for the return of Ruby Paone and for the gift of a baby girl to her and Marty, for the return of Henry Turner after his hospitalization, for all of the others unknown to us who have recovered from illness. Thank Thee, Father, for the faithful men and women who labor tirelessly, day in, day out, supporting the Senators in their leadership responsibilities.

We pray for the Senate wives who travel in India: Annie Glenn, Mary Johnston, Louise McClure, Nancy Murkowski, Colleen Nunn, and Barbara Pryor. Protect them in their journey and bring them safely home.

We pray for Pat Sarcone's Uncle Nick. We remember Justice O'Connor and pray for her total recovery, and for any others, Father, in our large family who are in need; cover them with Your gracious, loving care.

Be with each Senator at this critical time and grant to each a special measure of grace. In His name who is love incarnate, we pray. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the Chair recognizes the Senate majority leader.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At 11:30, the Senate will go into executive session to resume deliberations on the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The Senate will recess between the hours of 12:30 and 2:15 for the party conference luncheons.

At 2:15, the Senate will return to the Tower nomination. I remind my colleagues that at 4 p.m. today, the Senate will lay aside the Tower nomination to proceed to the nomination of Thomas Pickering to be Ambassador to the United Nations. The Pickering nomination will be considered under a time agreement of 20 minutes, equally divided between the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. PELL, and the ranking Republican member, Mr. HELMS.

A rollcall vote will occur on the Pickering nomination. Other rollcall votes are possible during today's session.

It is also my hope that the Senate will be able to proceed to the Bennett nomination this week. I am advised that the committee expects to act on that nomination on Thursday. Therefore, if my distinguished colleague, the Republican leader, agrees, we would try to move to it as promptly following the committee's action as possible, consistent with my commitment to the President to act as swiftly and expeditiously as possible on his nominees.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I yield to the distinguished Republican leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Republican leader.

NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I certainly agree with the majority leader with respect to disposing of the nominations as quickly as we can. I think when the Bennett nomination is completed, that will complete all action, except for the Secretary of Defense.

Insofar as that nomination is concerned, obviously those of us who support the nomination are still trying to determine how we can achieve a majority on the Tower nomination. We believe that the mood is changing. I can tell from my own phone calls. They were running 2- or 3-to-1 against Tower, and now 2- or 3-to-1 in favor of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I do not know of any orchestrated campaign to telephone me. There is no need to, in this instance. So I hope that we can continue. With one or two exceptions, we have had a fairly high-level debate. I think we do have the problem of the FBI report. We can, of course, remove the injunction of secrecy by resolution in the Senate, even though the President would not release it. So we can take action on our own on that, if it is deemed that we should release all or a portion of that report.

As I have said, I am seriously considering a motion—and I have given to the majority leader a copy of the unanimous-consent request and a copy of the motion—to bring Senator Tower into this Chamber, let him state his case, and submit to questions.

There are some new Members who have never met Senator Tower, who do not know Senator Tower, who have not had an opportunity to ask a tough question or to see how he reacts or to size him up. He served in this body for 24 years, and many of us know him well. We have a number of new Members, some Members who arrived since Senator Tower departed.

I must say that I am a little disturbed when I hear today that the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations' staff is still out investigating Senator Tower. Chairman NUNN is the chairman of that subcommittee and also chairman of the Armed Services Committee. Here we are in the debate, leading up to a vote on the nomination, and we learned this morning on our side that Senator NUNN notified Senator ROTH yesterday that he is going to send some more investigators out on Senator Tower. I do not understand that. Either we have a record or we do not have a record.

What are they investigating? Is it for the Armed Services Committee, or is it for something else? Has there ever been any detail from that subcommittee—I know they detail a lot of people to other committees—for the purpose of investigating a nominee? I think this is something of first blush. Is not the FBI record adequate? We have had a lot of people on that side say the FBI record is good enough. I do not know how to deal with it.

When does this investigation stop? We are told it is not personal. We are told on our side not to make it personal. We talked about the nominee, but when do we stop investigating Senator Tower, and who are the investigators? Are they there to try to help Senator Tower? I doubt it. Are they trying to find evidence that would support Senator Tower's position? I doubt it. What kind of evidence are these investigators looking for in Dallas, TX? Are we going to be told; is it confidential?

So it just seems to me that this is a very strange move—if it is accurate, and I think it is—on the part of the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, to have a subcommittee which he controls send people out who are not on the Armed Services Committee staff to investigate further the nominee, John Tower.

It makes it very difficult, I must say, for those of us on this side to make our case. I think there is some partisanship. I think we are all somewhat partisan in the right way, but this is very troubling.

Why would we still be investigating John Tower? It is on the Senate floor. The committee has voted. We have all kinds of documents up in S-407. And we learn today that they are still investigating Tower. They are still trying to put that last nail in his coffin. Is that fair? Is it fair to continue the investigation up to the time of the vote? What is the purpose of it? Does it help John Tower or do him more damage?

It is unprecedented, I will say that, if it is accurate.

I would hope that sometime today we would have the details of why it is necessary to continue the investigation and if any Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee could have been notified. Are there any Republicans accompanying the other staff people in this investigation?

I understand they may have been checking the Admiralty Club in Dallas and things of that kind.

I do think the basic issue in this case is fairness—fairness. This man has been investigated more than anyone else in history, this nominee, and we are still at it. As I understand it, we are still investigating him today.

So I would hope that we could have some resolution that we are going to end the investigation, release the report, and bring Senator Tower to the Chamber, because I think he is entitled to speak for himself, too.

I know some say, "Well, it is only one nominee. We will not know the difference in 3 or 4 weeks." He will know the difference and his family will know the difference and the President will know the difference, and in our hearts we will know the difference if he was treated unfairly.

So I would hope, if there is, we call off any more investigations unless we are all notified and unless we know what the purpose is, because it is troubling.

I do not know why it is necessary for a subcommittee of another committee to investigate a nominee on another committee that has jurisdiction.

I never heard of it before.

So I would hope that before the day is out we will have some explanation. Maybe they are down there trying to help Senator Tower—maybe.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, with respect to the FBI files, first, it ought to be clear that what we are talking about here is not just an FBI report. There are also committee records which contain a great deal of information that is directly relevant to this nomination. So if there is to be release of any information that is not now public, it ought to include everything. We ought not to be saying here that we just want the FBI file out but not the full committee record if we are going to have full disclosure, and we ought to have full disclosure.

The second point, the FBI files are the property of the executive branch, explicitly stated in writing by the counsel to the President, who before turning them over to the Senate for access by Senators required and received an explicit written commitment from the chairman and ranking Republican member of the committee acknowledging that the reports were the property of the President and agreeing at the request of the President not to permit any publication of that material beyond the terms of the agreement which was limited access to Members of the Senate.

Now there is a certain irony in the suggestion by those whose entire argument on the nomination itself is that we should accede to the President's wishes to now suggest that we should make public a report in direct opposition to the President's wishes.

This the President's report. He has provided it only on the explicit written condition that the Senate in writing acknowledged that it is his report and agreed in writing that it cannot be made public.

I note the ranking Republican member here. He is the person who signed the agreement and if I have in any way misstated the facts with respect to that I invite him to stand and correct me.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield, as far as I know the majority leader made an accurate rendition.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator.

In that circumstance, a decision must be made. Now, if the distinguished Republican leader or any Member of the Senate wishes to make a motion that the FBI records and all of the other relevant material should be made public, each Senator is free to do so, and we will deal with that request at the time it is made.

But it ought to be stated that no one has made such a motion yet despite repeated discussion of it. The President has not come forward to ask that the terms of the written agreement be altered and indeed it is my understanding that the President's counsel, the chairman of the committee, and the ranking Republican member of the committee, three men, two of them Republicans, one Democrat, met, discussed the matter at some length and agreed unanimously that the reports should not be made public, and I believe that was reaffirmed by the President's spokesman as recently as yesterday afternoon.

Now, no one is required to make a motion. I simply say that if someone wishes to make a motion he is free to do so, and we will, of course, deal with that at that time. The distinguished Republican leader is free to make that motion.

In my view, if that is to be done, we ought certainly to solicit the view of the President to determine if the President's view is still what it had been consistently throughout this process, that the report should not be made public.

I see the Republican leader. Does he wish to respond? I am glad to yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I add: Does the majority leader think we still should be investigating the nominee yesterday and today, that we ought to have Senator NUNN's investigators out checking on Senator Tower yesterday and today? Is that going to be made public?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would prefer to consult with Senator NUNN before responding to that because I do not know the full details myself.

Mr. DOLE. Just as a matter of fairness, should we still be investigating the nominee?

Mr. MITCHELL. As I said I believe I will be prepared to respond to that when I have had a chance for full consultation. I would simply note, when the Republican leader asked rhetorically are they there to help Senator Tower, I have not understood any investigator to conduct an investigation for the benefit or detriment of the nominee. It is my understanding that the investigations are conducted to establish the facts to enable the recipients of the report to make a suitable judgment.

In any event on that score, I will defer response until I am in possession of all the information, which I am not now.

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate on the report itself, it is almost accurate. I just happened to run into an FBI agency yesterday. He was not investigating me or anybody else. We just happened to be in the same building. He said, "I have been listening to that debate, and I have been listening to all the Senators talk about the FBI report." He said, "It is not a report."

The majority leader correctly said it is a file you put everything in.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is exactly right.

Mr. DOLE. It is not a report. They do not make any judgment.

He said, "We take down everything people tell us. We put it all in a file."

I think I have said the same—we have an FBI report. We have not a report. They did not make any judgment. They did not draw any conclusions. They put every little bit of information they could find in that file, and the file is up in S-407, or parts of it. I guess they summarized some of it.

So I wanted to underscore what the majority leader said. It is not a report. It is not a judgment by anybody in the FBI.

We have to make our judgment based upon reading the file, and I think that is significant because I felt just watching on C-SPAN I guess we were getting carried away with all this FBI business. He said, "If you interviewed as many witnesses as I have over the years, you might have a little different attitude. But it is a file."

But I think there is a larger question now. We have a file upstairs, all kinds of files, majority file, minority file, the real file. And now we find we still have people out investigating Senator Tower on another committee; not staff of the Armed Services Committee, but staff of another committee.

I just ask: When does it stop? Is it fair? Are they out there trying to help Senator Tower? I would doubt it. Because we know if we are going to get enough votes on this side we have to underscore the fact that the nominee has not been treated fairly, and we want to do that in a way not to offend anybody who is still undecided. But it is pretty difficult to do if we do not know the rules of the game.

I hope that when we conclude here, as I said the other day, regardless of the outcome, everybody can say, "Well, at least Senator Tower was accorded fair treatment." That is the least he can expect as a nominee and as a former Member. I hope there is still some way to resolve how that can be done.

I know the White House is looking right now at dividing that FBI file. According to the counsel for the President, sections 5 through 9 of that file were initiated by the Senate. So they argue it may not be the same confidentiality. Maybe that part could be released. Maybe we could go up and take notes and rely on those and come to the floor and debate it. Then chapters I through IV, I guess, were initiated by the President. They feel that has a little different classification.

But the majority leader is right. We have not yet resolved how to release it without releasing a lot of names that might embarrass people who are perfectly innocent on either side.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if I may respond. I have tried to stress in all of my comments, both public and private, that there has developed a widespread misconception about the nature of the documents that exist in this case. I said that I believe Senators who went to S-407 in the expectation that there existed a single document or series of documents that would resolve this matter for them, that would in effect eliminate the need for their exercise of individual judgment, any such Senators in my view were mistaken.

The distinguished Republican leader is correct. It is merely a file. It is one of many documents which exist. And no matter how many documents exist, no matter how many reports are made, the ultimate decision will rest with each individual Senator in the exercise of his or her judgment.

The President has said that he opposes the release of this FBI file to date for sound policy reasons; that is, if this is made public a lot of people will be embarrassed in this case and it will be difficult for the FBI to conduct any such inquiries in the future and the President needs and relies upon these documents and these reports and these files in his own determination of nominees; not just this one, but virtually all nominees. It is a requirement for the President. It is important to him.

So I think we have to evaluate carefully how we handle that. If and when such a request or motion is made in the Senate, we will obviously deal with it at that time.

I simply say one thing: There is much disagreement on this, but I think there is a growing agreement that it has gone on long enough. It is my hope that we will be able to bring this matter to a conclusion as soon as possible, as soon as there has been a full debate, and certainly this week.

We are now entering the fourth, we are now in, in this leader time, the fourth full day of debate. There have been extensive discussion, extensive deliberation and consideration. It is my hope that we can now bring it to a conclusion and move on to other things and hopefully in a manner that will not impair our ability to deal effectively with the business, the other important business, that is before us.

I do not want to create any impression of unfairness. I have tried very hard to be fair and accommodating with respect to this debate. I do not want to prevent any Senator from having the fullest opportunity to express his or her opinions, to engage in as much debate as he or she chooses.

But at some point, as we all know, the full debate has occurred and delay begins. I do not think we have reached that point. I hope we do not reach that point. I hope that soon the distinguished Republican leader will agree and, in consultation with his colleagues, indicate that we want to proceed to a vote. It seems to me that we are at that point. We have listened, we have debated, we have evaluated, we have discussed, we have read, and I believe the time has come to vote. I hope we will do so soon.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have listened——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will withhold one moment. We are approaching the end of the time that was to be allowed for morning business, then to return in 2 or 3 minutes to the consideration of the nomination of Senator Tower.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair for that observation. I am not sure it is in order since we are still in the approved time. But I appreciate the advice that has been given by the Chair.

Has the Chair recognized the Senator from Nebraska?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair indicated that simply to say that we are now in the conclusion of morning business and obviously a request to extend that——

Mr. EXON. As I understand it, we have until 11:30, is that right, or am I wrong?

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. I am happy to yield.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the period for morning business be extended for 10 minutes to permit Senators REID and ROCKEFELLER, each of whom have requested the opportunity to address the Senate on a matter unrelated to the nomination, to speak in morning business for 5 minutes each.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, if the leader will yield, at some point in time, if the distinguished chairman desires to clarify some of the procedural aspects relating to what is going on in the Governmental Affairs Committee, I would simply recount a conversation that we had had on Sunday morning just before I went to church and comment on the FBI report.

Mr. EXON. A point of order, Mr. President. Who has the floor?

Mr. WARNER. That need not take place now.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate majority leader has the floor at this time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, who has graciously yielded to me. I think what Senator WARNER has suggested can occur once we get into the debate. I think that is the appropriate time for it.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, the problem we have in this body is we set time limits and other Senators take all the time up. We all have an equal opportunity here when it goes beyond the majority leader and minority leader.

I have listened to the debate that has been going on between the majority and minority leaders and I just wish to make a few clarifiying statements.

Senator NUNN is now on the floor and can speak for himself. I would simply emphasize that all through this procedure there has been no one that has been more fair and objective than SAM NUNN, the chairman of the committee. Also, I would include in that JOHN WARNER, the ranking member of the Armed Services Committee. Both of them have been outstanding.

I think it is fair to assume that if we all want to be fair we should not place SAM NUNN or JOHN WARNER on trial. JOHN WARNER is a counterpart of SAM NUNN on the Armed Services Committee, but he does not need to be placed on trial, nor do I think he should be. I think he has carried out his responsibilities very well as, I suggest, has the chairman of the committee.

As far as fairness is concerned, I think it is important that we continue the investigations of matters that are brought to the attention of the committee through whatever source. The Armed Services Committee is not an investigative committee. If it is the desire of Senator NUNN to do some additional investigation on charges that have arisen because Members both on that side of the aisle and this one who have not made up their minds may want some of the latest information, I think it is grossly unfair and does not do any good to the process if we are going to continue this proposition of one side accusing the other of being in bad faith.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader had made a motion that the time for morning business, which has now arrived, be extended for 10 minutes.

The Chair recognizes again the Senate majority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I amend my request to ask that Senator NUNN be permitted to address the Senate for 2 minutes, or such time as he needs.

Mr. NUNN. A couple of minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. And following that, Senators REID and ROCKEFELLER at 5 minutes each and then go into executive session.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business as indicated by the majority leader, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished minority leader has raised questions about the Subcommittee on Investigations of the Governmental Affairs Committee and what they are doing involving themselves in this Tower business. Let me just explain to the minority leader. I think it is a perfectly legitimate question, and I will be glad to answer it.

No. 1, we continue to get in allegations against John Tower. I, frankly, wish we had not had any for the last 6 weeks, but they continue to come in. We have gotten three or four new allegations from people who give their names, give their addresses, give their phone numbers, give the particular situation that they allege they have observed.

The question is, to the committee, do we say: "No, we are sorry, we have cut off all investigations"? It is hard for me to be able to say that. Perhaps the Senate would like to say that to us, do not investigate anything else. But at the same time we are told by the minority leader that this may go on this week. I heard him say the other day it may go next week. I heard him talk about the possibility of additional hearings.

So I do not know where we cut if off. I think perhaps the Senate and leadership should tell us. I am perfectly willing to abide by whatever the leadership says on that score. But as long as we get in allegations and as long as we are not told that our duties as far as checking these allegations are not terminated by the Senate, I think we have a duty to investigate them.

The question then arises how do we investigate them? I have been told, I do not have it in writing, but I have been told the FBI has been pulled out of this matter now, that they are no longer involved, and the White House does not want them to pursue anything further. That may or may not be accurate, but that is what I have been told. So I have felt, being told that, that it was not proper to continue to send matters down to the White House and ask them to get the FBI to observe and to check those.

Again, if that is erroneous, I would be prepared to revert to the procedure we have used all along and send the request to the White House, the allegation, and let them have the FBI go out and check it and so forth.

Again, I will await the instructions of the Senate and, indeed, the instructions of the White House. If they want to have the FBI continue, then I will be glad to proceed in that fashion after consulting with Senator WARNER and the members of the committee.

At this stage, we have a policy staff. There are not investigators. They are not trained in that mode. We have never gotten our investigative staff involved in this. We have only had policy people on both sides of the aisle, the reason being we have relied on the White House and the FBI to check into every allegation that has been a serious allegation. Then it comes to the question, if the FBI is not involved and if the Senate does, indeed, intend for us to proceed, we have no choice but to get some investigators in that are trained.

I have a former district attorney who is involved. I have a couple of investigators on the investigators subcommittee. They, at my request, on late Saturday afternoon received a couple of allegations and I told them to get started on Sunday subject to me calling three people. First, Senator GLENN, the chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs. I called Senator GLENN and got his permission. The second, Senator WARNER, the ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee. I wanted him to be fully informed. Third, Senator ROTH, who is the ranking Republican on the Governmental Affairs Committee as well as the ranking Republican on the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. I called all three of them. I got Senator GLENN's permission. I got Senator WARNER's at least acknowledgment. I will let him describe his own view on it but he was informed, fully informed. And Senator ROTH was fully informed.

So I feel that we have proceeded in good faith. I think we proceeded in accordance with the circumstances we were in.

We are not initiating these matters. We are not out just roaming around and checking things. We are checking only allegations that are brought to the attention of the committee in due course and we are doing it only to follow up on those allegations and to corroborate them if they prove to be valid.

So, that is the story. I feel that we have followed the normal procedure here and we have checked with all the people we need to check with.

But, again, if the Senate of the United States wants to tell us, "Look, this is over, no more investigations, no more checking on allegations," then that is the Senate's prerogative and we will abide by that as the committee of jurisdiction.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. May I proceed for 2 minutes?

First of all, as far as I know the FBI has not been cut out. I do not know when they were cut out and by whom. And I do not know of any precedent. I know the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations' staff is detailed to a lot of other committees, but I do not know they have ever been tracking down allegations on nominees. Maybe there is precedent for that.

I think it is fair to say that Senator ROTH was advised; not consulted. The chairman did not indicate any other thing.

I do not think the minority was ever told anything about allegations, what the allegations were, as far as I know. We have no knowledge yet as to what the allegations were. So it is sort of a unilateral investigation. I am not certain any of the minority staff members were present during the investigation; what the investigation is about; what the allegations were. It seems to me highly unusual, highly unprecedented.

I thought we have all taken so much pride in this FBI file. We have been talking about the FBI file and how we are going to release that. Now we have another group out investigating Senator Tower on the very eve of or during the debate.

I do not know precedent for that. I guess we can make the case we are going to investigate until the last vote is cast. Maybe somebody will run it right before somebody votes aye or no, and say hold it, I just got something, I got it over the transom. We will go out and investigate that.

I know Senator Tower heard about it. He was puzzled by it. He could not believe it. They were down at the Admiralty Club at American Airlines I think in Dallas or somewhere, checking out his drinking habits. I understand they came out quite well.

Who knows what else they are checking out. But if we are going to have this investigation, then those on this side and those who may support Senator Tower ought to be apprised of what the investigation is all about. Not just some notice. Again, we are making our case of fairness. And unfairness. I do not see anything fair to Senator Tower in this effort.

Normally we go to the FBI. I do not know, they have not called me to tell me they are out of this case. I assume if they get some direction from the committee as they have in the past they will investigate it. There are five chapters of that file up there that have been initiated by the committee, where the FBI has gone out and made very exhaustive searches.

So I would hope that at least those of us on this side and those who support Senator Tower know the nature of the allegations, how many people are out there, what are they doing, who they are doing it for, does it help Senator Tower or is it to get Senator Tower?

It seems in fairness they ought to be a full disclosure to everybody; not just notice to a couple of members and chairmen of the committee. We would be happy to cooperate if there is some serious allegation. But this is without precedent.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia still has the floor.

Mr. NUNN. I would just say to the minority leader that I did orally inform Senator WARNER of the nature of the allegations. I did that on Sunday morning. And I will be perfectly delighted to share anything with the minority, as we have all along in this whole process.

I will be glad to do that today. I will be glad to do it in the next hour. It was my opinion that the minority did not want to participate in any further investigations of this at this time. But that may be erroneous.

If that is the case we will stand corrected and be glad to share fully on a timely basis all the information.

But I did believe that I have made our views known to the Senator from Virginia, and acquainted him orally with the nature of the allegation.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NUNN. I will be glad to yield the floor.

Mr. WARNER. I wonder if I might just engage the chairman in a colloquy, help me refresh my recollection.

Up until the Thursday night vote we have worked together in a totally cooperative method, spirit, as it has been characterized here on the floor by the two of us and some others. But once we made the independent judgments and came to the fork in the road and you elected to go your course and I elected to go my course—up until that time I think both of us had kept an open mind so that we could, in fairness, perform our work.

History will record the advisability of that course of action. But since that time, our staffs essentially have gone their independent way in servicing the respective memberships.

I have just consulted with my staff director. There has been no animosity, there has been no iron curtain that has dropped down, but there has not been this ever-present, 24-hour-a-day exchange of information and cooperative effort on behalf of the two staffs, and that is understandable, considering the framework of this debate now in the Senate.

Mr. NUNN. I will say to my friend, that has worked on both sides. We had that clear understanding, and the staff had that understanding because, for instance, in the Sergeant Jackson matter, the minority staff pursued that matter without notifying us. I thought it was perfectly appropriate for them to pursue it. They worked for Senator MCCAIN, they worked for the Air Force, and they got a letter from the Air Force. A letter from the Air Force was printed in the RECORD. We knew none of that until such time we came on the floor.

The Senator from Virginia is correct. We had an understanding through Thursday night. Since then, we had an understanding we would handle it as necessary on an ad hoc basis.

Mr. WARNER. The chairman is correct. As such time as the committee requested certain documents from the Department of Air Force, it was last Friday evening when it was brought to my attention; last Friday afternoon. I tried to locate one of the three Senators on our side who has been actively involved in the Air Force sergeant's case. All had left Washington. So with the assistance of counsel here, who had been actively working with the other three Senators, we acknowledged in a brief colloquy on the floor that the material was printed.

The one other area we have worked in is the area of communications with the Attorney General. Early on in this case, at my initiative, indeed if not at my insistence, the chairman and I addressed certain letters to the Attorney General about matters under his cognizance which could have had some application to this nomination. We felt it necessary to follow up another letter to the Attorney General.

So with the exception of the sergeant and the Attorney General, I know of no other efforts where we, by necessity, have not come together.

Sunday morning, roughly at 10:30—I remember it very well because I was in a rush to get to church and I was late—the chairman called me and said that he felt it necessary for the chairman, utilizing the Governmental Affairs, to do such additional inquiry and verification, corroboration, so forth, of information that had come to his attention. I said, "Well, since our committee had discharged this nomination to the floor, really I have no longer an involvement in it." He said that he had taken the matter up—I cannot remember the exact phraseology—with Senator ROTH.

I did inquire, just as a matter of courtesy, if this material looks to be troublesome, or something to that effect. The chairman said pretty much more the same. It is an allegation about an airline and people making observations on an airline. That is the extent, I believe.

Mr. NUNN. I related one other allegation to you on the telephone of a different nature. But the Senator is generally correct. It was an oral description of the allegation.

Mr. WARNER. It had been my intention, as we have worked all along together, to consult with the chairman yesterday as soon as we arrived here at the Senate. When I arrived, I was told the chairman was stranded in New York because of bad weather, and I followed his movements through the day. I do not know what time he got back. I think it was about 5 or 6 o'clock. Anyway, the business of the Senate closed down, and the Republican leader and I and others were engaged in something. I did not take it upon myself to find the chairman and follow up, but I had planned to do so this morning.

I believe that is the extent of the knowledge I have, other than to say there has been frequent reference about the FBI here. I think the Republican leader quite accurately said this is not a report. It is simply a collection of information, but I say in fairness to the FBI, it is the manner in which they handled all these cases.

This case has been no different than the others, except for the volume and extraordinary thoroughness of their investigation. I think those two points auger well for the nominee because no other case in the history of America before the Senate, as far as I can determine in my research, has been as carefully investigated by the FBI and the information collected and passed on in the form that it is traditionally done.

Mr. DOLE. I think there is a little difference, though, in the FBI investigating and somebody who was hired by the chairman, members of his staff, under his control. The FBI is paid by all the taxpayers, not hired by anybody in this body.

I just suggest, again, in fairness, if we send a staff investigator who is hired by BOB DOLE or someone else, they work for me. They are down there investigating for me. I think that is a far cry from the FBI out there working, hopefully, for the American people.

That is why I think this is so unusual and without precedent. We have some committee staff of another committee out checking a nominee addressed by another committee when the matter is already on the Senate floor. When it reaches the floor, the leader ought to have some notice of what is going on.

Mr. NUNN. I will be glad to follow the dictates of the Senate. If the Senate wants us to cut off all further investigations, if the leadership decides that collectively, or the Senate, I will be glad to do that. If the White House says the FBI is still in business and they check the allegations and the minority leader prefers to go that route, I will be glad to go that way.

We are really now in a situation where it is up to the Senate itself. I say to the minority staff, I think they were perfectly within their rights to do this. They conducted their own rebuttal examination on the Sergeant Jackson matter the other day.

Mr. DOLE. That was a leak.

Mr. NUNN. Well, what is the difference? We were not informed until the matter came to the Senate. I am not complaining about it. I am just asking the minority leader what the difference is. We will follow whatever the leadership wants to do.

I will say, our PSI subcommittee has been loaned to other committees on at least a couple of occasions that I am personally familiar with to help check nominations. So this is not unprecedented. Again, we will do whatever the Senate would like to do. I will defer to the Senate leadership.

Mr. WARNER. Can I ask the Senator one additional question?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Going back to our brief conversation, it is my recollection you said whatever work was being done by the Governmental Affairs Committee was in response to information that had either come to you personally or to Governmental Affairs, but that you were not out trying to find——

Mr. NUNN. Absolutely not. We were not out investigating ad hoc. It was only in response to allegations coming that people say they wanted to talk to someone in the committee, they wanted to make certain information known. At that instance, we either have two choices: Call them up and say we do not want any more information or have somebody check it.

If the FBI is off the case, as I have been told, then we have no choice but to do it through some other resource.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, two clarifications. I think that helps the word "investigations." That might be construed either way.

Will the Senator be in position to advise us of his information that the FBI is no longer involved in this matter?

Mr. NUNN. That came from the FBI.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senate majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I believe this is a matter that should not be discussed among the leadership of the Senate and the committee. It is, obviously, a very difficult circumstance. I think we have to be very careful about what we suggest here.

One implication from this exchange is that once a matter reaches the Senate floor, that the Senate ought to be impervious to any information presented to it that has not previously been presented; that any allegation, no matter how serious, no matter from what source, no matter how well corroborated, ought to be disregarded. I think we have to be very careful about that.

I do not prejudge the issue. I just think that there are a lot of implications that go beyond this particular matter or incident that we have to consider. It is my hope and intention that we can do so carefully and produce a decision that is the most fair and appropriate under the circumstances.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I do not think anyone is suggesting that there ought not to be a thorough investigation on any facts of the matter. The question which comes to my mind is the propriety of going to another subcommittee, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, and dispatching resources from that subcommittee on a matter which is pending on the Senate floor, having been reported out of another committee, the Armed Services Committee.

Now, there has been a very expansive investigation made by the FBI. There is a file. It may or may not be the FBI file is closed but any FBI file is subject to being reopened at any time. This Senator has a real question about the propriety of having another subcommittee going into a matter which is really outside the jurisdiction of that subcommittee. I think that the American people have a right to know as well as Senator Tower why another subcommittee has been called upon to investigate him. It is obviously a matter of some concern when the Senator from Georgia has initiated that investigation on the subcommittee when he is the chairman of the committee which has conducted an exhaustive investigation, held hearings, and filed a committee report. There also has been a question as to motivation here as to really what is going on.

The question is of the majority leader—perhaps the Senator from Georgia wants to respond—why does another subcommittee conduct an investigation in the context of this matter when you have the issue within the jurisdiction of the Senate as a whole with the matter having been turned over by the Armed Services Committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. If I may respond—is this a question?

Mr. SPECTER. This is a question.

Mr. MITCHELL. He already answered the question. He just answered it in a statement on the Senate floor and I am sure he will be pleased to do so again. But he responded to the inquiry which the distinguished Republican leader has already made in terms similar to those that the Senator has just asked.

My point now is that we have to make—Senator NUNN has indicated that he will be agreeable to the dictates of the Senate in this regard, and it is my hope to discuss it with the distinguished Republican leader and others to determine what the best way to proceed is. I am very pleased that the Senator from Pennsylvania has indicated he is not suggesting that allegations should be disregarded but, rather, they should be investigated, and that is something we will look into. But my point is that the question has been asked and answered.

Mr. SPECTER. I just consulted with the Republican leader as to the answer. It may have been answered but perhaps not satisfactorily answered. Might I ask—occasionally we engage in some repetition on this floor. Might I ask for a repeat of the answer?

Mr. MITCHELL. I just want to say this. I am prepared to accede to this, but we are not going to get in a position here where one, two, three, four, five, six, seven people come over here and ask the same question and the Senator has to give the same answer over again. We talk about doing this in a rational manner. Whether the answer is unsatisfactory is a wholly subjective matter. One may listen to an answer once, twice, 100 times and still not be satisfied.

So I will yield to the Senator from Georgia if he wishes to respond again to the question, but I hope that following this response we could get on with the suggestion which all involved have now made; that is, we discuss this matter and see if there is some fair and appropriate method for resolving how we proceed from here. With that I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NUNN. I would say in response to my friend from Pennsylvania, No. 1, I have been told the FBI is no longer involved in this so sending the matter down to the White House and asking the FBI to investigate it anew would be an exercise in futility at this stage. Again, if I am wrong on that, the White House can let us know. If the FBI is still in business, then obviously that is the preferred way to proceed. I am a little bit perplexed this morning though to find that those on that side of the aisle who have been so critical of relying on the FBI report now would like for us to get back into the FBI checking all the allegations because that was not my understanding of what we have been hearing here for 2 or 3 days.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. NUNN. Let me just finish my observation and then I will yield. No. 2, we did have a firm understanding, the Senator from Virginia and I have all along, that we were working on this problem together right up to the vote last Thursday and the Senator said after that we split, we go our own ways. We have a majority report on the floor. We have a majority report in S-407. We have a minority report on the floor. We have a minority report up there. The minority checked out the Air Force, got an Air Force letter without us being told.

Again, I say that was absolutely appropriate. I have no complaint about it whatsoever. They have been doing their business since Thursday night of the committee vote. We have been doing ours.

No. 3, we continued to get allegations. Now, if the Senate wants to cut it off and say no more allegations, we are not going to investigate anymore, that is fine.

No. 4, I do not have, nor have I ever had, an investigative staff working on this. The Armed Services staff is not investigative. They are not equipped to investigate. They do not have the background to investigate. They are policy. We have done all the investigation through the White House and the FBI. That is where all the investigations have come from. If someone wants to change that procedure in the future, we are going to have to have an investigative staff.

So the final determination that I made this weekend was that we had to do something with these new allegations. Do we check them? If so, who checks them? We have used the PSI subcommittee staff before because they are probably the best investigators on Capitol Hill, at least on this side of the Capitol, and we have actually loaned them to other committees on at least two or three occasions since I have been chairman, to investigate the same thing, nominations.

And so I felt it was appropriate to ask them to go out and check these allegations. But I informed Senator WARNER and let him know about that. I informed Senator ROTH and let him know about that. I know nothing else that we could have done. But again I will be perfectly happy to go back to the procedure where the FBI checks these. I am not the one who thinks the FBI botched this whole thing. I am not one of those. I am willing to go back to that procedure. I am willing to go back to the procedure we had before the Thursday night vote and have the two staffs work together and send everything down jointly. I am willing to do that. I am willing to abide by the minority leader and majority leader if they decide we are not going to investigate anything else while this is pending. But you have to understand we have been told that this matter may go on this week and next week. I have heard the minority leader himself say that it may be good to go back and have some hearings or something of that nature. We still hear some people saying that the FBI report should come out in toto.

So I do not know where we are in this procedure. I do not know when we are going to vote. I do not know quite what our duties are as a committee. Certainly as chairman—and I am certain other members will feel this way—I will abide by what the Senate as a whole wants us to do.

Mr. SPECTER. What was the jurisdiction of the subcommittee—this was a very interesting response to another question, but what is the jurisdiction of the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee?

Mr. NUNN. It is very, very broad, I would say to the Senator. It has investigative powers over almost any activity of Government and it basically follows the lead of the chairman of the subcommittee and ranking minority member. The chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member of the committee, all of those people have been checked with on this.

Senator GLENN was the first person I called, the chairman of the full committee. The second person I called, I believe, was Senator WARNER to inform him. The third person I called was Senator ROTH, who is the ranking member on both the subcommittee and on the full Government Affairs Committee. So before any activities were undertaken, these people were checked with. That is the procedure that we have normally followed for years.

Mr. WARNER. Will the Senator yield for a correction of fact?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. NUNN. I yield.

Mr. WARNER. In our conversation, the Senator from Georgia said he had spoken to Senator GLENN and Senator ROTH and was advising me.

Mr. NUNN. I had that wrong. I talked to Senator ROTH. I stand corrected.

Mr. SPECTER. Aside from the fact that it has been done in the past and the fact the Senator from Georgia may have informed some people, is the Senator from Georgia asserting that the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee has plenary, full, jurisdiction to investigate any matter, even one which is pending on the Senate floor, with the report having been filed, and the relevant committee, the Armed Services Committee, having finished its work?

Mr. NUNN. I would say, if the chairman of the committee and the ranking member of the committee and the others involved, the chairman of the full committee, have no objection, and no one objected whatsoever, that there would be no problem whatsoever for the subcommittee to get into this. These were new matters, not matters that were up in S-407. These were not matters the FBI checked; these were not witnesses that had ever come forward; these were new matters, new allegations that came up.

There was no other way to check them. The Subcommittee on Investigations has that authority, yes; the answer is "yes."

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT (Mr. ADAMS). The Chair wishes to remind the Senate that under the previous order, the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from West Virginia were to be recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to speak for 2 minutes on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the matters which are before the Senate at the moment are somewhat novel. I have listened to the explanation by the Senator from Georgia, and, speaking for myself, I find the explanation unsatisfactory. When a matter is before the U.S. Senate and under consideration on the basis of a report having been filed by the relevant committee, it seems to me highly questionable, if not inappropriate, for the matter to go back to the subcommittee to conduct a collateral investigation, with notice only on the basis of notice being given by the chairman of that committee.

When the matter is before the full Senate, even the relevant committee cannot take the matter up again, does not have jurisdiction, unless there is a motion to recommit. The Republican leader has commented about this matter, that the leadership was not informed. The proceedings on the investigation of Senator Tower are a matter of enormous concern to the country. It seems to this Senator that, as a matter of obvious coincidence, when the chairman of the Armed Services Committee has filed a report taking a very, very strong position, and the matter is on the Senate floor and then the subcommittee which he chairs, as I understand it, certainly is in a dominant position, conducts this kind of collateral investigation—true, it is known to some Members on this side of the aisle—but in the context of this case, it seems to this Senator inappropriate, and I think it has to be pursued to see where it leads us.

I, for one—and I know the Republican leader concurs in this—want all of the facts. We want all of the facts to be before the Senate, before the American people, but there is an orderly way to proceed. I do not think it is by referral to the subcommittee in this context.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator give us the orderly way that he advocates now? When we get an allegation, are we supposed to send it to the White House when we have been told that the FBI is off the case? Are we supposed to try to reestablish a joint procedure here? What would the Senator suggest that we do with new allegations? He says he wants to pursue them.

We are being badgered every day by not having evidence. We are saying we do not have the evidence. The evidence is in S-407, and we signed a contract with the President of the United States and his counsel, Mr. Gray, to reveal that. Yet, we are asked "Where is your evidence?" It is up in S-407, but we are pledged not to reveal it. Now we are told that if we have new allegations in, we should not investigate them, I suppose. What is the orderly procedure the Senator is advocating?

Mr. SPECTER. I will gladly respond to that question. The comments about the material being in S-407 and not disclosable on the Senate floor, have no relevancy at all, as to who is to undertake the next line of investigation. While this debate was in process, Boyden Gray, counsel to the President, has sent this message: "Both the White House and the FBI have said that they would be glad to follow up on any new allegations, if asked to do so."

No one has asked either Boyden Gray or the FBI to follow up on any new allegations. The concerns that this Senator has turn on the unusual nature of having the subcommittee undertake this investigation, where the chairman of the Armed Services Committee is also the chairman of that subcommittee. You the FBI having conducted the investigation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SPECTER. Has the time of the Senator from Georgia expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired, under the previous agreement.

Mr. NUNN. I ask unanimous consent for 1 minute, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator from Pennsylvania told me something here I did not know today, because I have been told by the FBI that the White House told them they were not to pursue anything further. If that is not the case and the FBI is still in business, and the Senate decides that is the way to proceed, I will be the first to say, "Let us move back." But I am interested now in getting the perspective that this procedure, which we have been hearing all week is so unfair, with the FBI having done the check, is now what we want to go back to.

Mr. SPECTER. Boyden Gray commented that no one asked the FBI to continue with any followup investigation. Has the Senator from Georgia made such a request?

Mr. NUNN. No, but I was told before the allegations came in, by the FBI themselves, they have been basically taken off the case.

Mr. SPECTER. I think we have an agreement. The answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia is, it ought to go to the FBI for followup investigation.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the time of the Senator from Pennsylvania expired, that time having been 2 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. May the junior Senator from West Virginia proceed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized and may proceed.

JAPAN AND THE FSX FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I would like to talk about the proposed agreement with Japan on the development of their new fighter aircraft the FSX. This is the result of many years of discussion among the Department of Defense, various American defense contractors, and the Japanese Government. On January 12, the United States reached agreement with Japan to share the $1.2 billion development and production work on this aircraft. General Dynamics would be the main American company involved, receiving 35 to 45 percent of the work in the development stage. At a later date, a memorandum of understanding would be negotiated about sharing the production work. Because the project involves sensitive technology, the executive branch must give General Dynamics an export license which must be submitted to the Congress. If we take on action within 30 days, the license is approved.

I am extremely distressed by the process that the negotiations have followed. Between 1951 and 1984, Japan spent $17 billion on 42,000 contracts for the importation of technology from abroad. Much of this technology came from the United States, and, without it, the much-admired Japanese miracle could never have occurred. Industry after industry in the United States sold its technology, sold its so-called crown jewels, with the expectation that they had such a technological lead that Japan could never catch up. Well, they have all been proven wrong, as Japan has caught up and has become our most determined economic competitor. Now we are about to transfer advanced military technology, and I am worried that we have not given very much thought to the competitive implications of that.

In January, I urged the Department of Defense, the Department of State, and the National Security Council to delay notification of Congress that would start the 30-day clock ticking. I thought then, and I believe even more now, that we must have a full interagency review of this arrangement. I am very disturbed that the Department of Commerce, the U.S. Trade Representative, and the White House Science Adviser were not fully consulted during the bilateral negotiations. I do not want to use our security relationship with Japan as leverage on trade issues, and, in fact, I do not think this could be done even if we wanted to. But I am unwilling to see those who manage our defense relationship run roughshod over America's competitive future.

I was pleased that the executive branch agreed to an interagency review. I have noted reports over the weekend of a possible refinement in the bilateral agreement to assure that key American technologies would be protected. This appears to be movement in the right direction. This is a very complex subject, and I am not totally convinced that the March 10 deadline for the interagency group to make its recommendations provides enough time for the completion of an adequate review. I hope that we will not allow artificial deadlines to establish our national agenda.

In the meantime, I will make no judgment whether the FSX agreement damages our competitive capabilities in the aerospace sector. I look forward to seeing the results of a thorough interagency review process that will look closely at this country's economic and trade interests.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized for 5 minutes under the previous order.

TOXIC MATERIALS IN THE AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. REID. Mr. President, yesterday the subcommittee that I chair and the ranking member, Senator WARNER, heard testimony, I think, that would be disturbing to all of us. I chaired a hearing on worker exposure to toxic materials in the aerospace industry. American citizens who were exposed to toxic composite materials relayed the daily pain that now dominates their lives.

The five women who testified represent hundreds of people who have been made sick as a result of their work in the aerospace industry. These people used to be hardworking American citizens. They are no longer hardworking because the ability to work has been taken away from them.

After exposure to chemical composites that are relatively new to the aerospace and defense workplace, these people suffer from extreme skin rashes, memory loss, and lung irritations, as one doctor testified, brain poisoning, and other maladies. Some, though, do not suffer anymore. They are dead.

As an example of one of the injuries, a young woman who worked for Lockheed for 10 years appeared as a witness. She was wearing very dark glasses and gloves covering her hands to protect against the sensitivity and pain. She experienced on a frequent basis seizures. She wore the gloves because here fingers bled constantly and she was losing all the nails on her hands.

Not only did we have workers testify from Boeing and Lockheed, but we also had a woman who was standing on a streetcorner in Van Nuys, CA, next to a UPS truck when suddenly something the truck was carrying started steaming and smoking. She has been unable to work since then. The chemicals that were in this truck made her very, very ill.

So how do we respond to these people whose lives have been irreparably damaged? What do we say to the 44-year-old former Boeing employee who frequently cannot remember even how old her children are and sometimes their names?

The purpose of yesterday's hearing was to find out how such an unacceptable situation could develop.

Mr. President, the testimony yesterday determined that there are 65,000 chemicals in use in our country today; 2,000 new chemicals every year are introduced into the American workplace. We do not have sufficient testing of these chemicals before they are used; before they are placed into the hands of employees, and yes, customers. Congress has to address these inadequate controls over these new chemical introductions.

The applicable agency, the Environmental Protection Agency, said that the division that does the testing of these chemicals in the past 8 years has been taken from $40 million to less than $20 million, down around $17 million. It has been cut more than in half and left without the ability to adequately test the chemicals that are coming into the workplace every day. There are 65,000 chemicals, and only a few hundred have been tested, Mr. President.

Although the hearing focused on the threatening situation that confronts aerospace industry employees, companies are merely using a chemical or a combination thereof that the Government has approved for production.

The burden of proof under the present law is on the Government to demonstrate that a chemical is dangerous.

I indicated that the Environmental Protection Agency, Mr. President, has only tested a few hundred of these chemicals. They have not tested any of them in combination. They only test them singularly. So with the few hundred they have tested out of 65,000, they find that chemical is OK, there is nothing to indicate what would happen when it is mixed with another.

Current laws are written to protect the chemical manufacturer more than people. I think it is time we reassess the present law, because once the chemicals are approved for production, there is still an opportunity to shield people from danger.

We can investigate the effect of those chemicals on the employees that have contact with them. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration [OSHA] has responsibility for such efforts.

OSHA representatives testified yesterday that they have visited only 2½ percent of all the manufacturing companies in this country last year, 2½ percent. So 97½ percent were not examined.

The composite chemicals at the center of our concerns represent a step forward in new technology and scientific breakthroughs, and we have to recognize that. That is because they are lighter and stronger. These composites are expected in the near future to replace much of the metal used in automobiles and aircraft. So I think we should all be proud that our country can boast of these achievements.

I wholeheartedly support the continued nurturing of American technology and invention. Such advances help our economy and, yes, strengthen our defense. However, we cannot tolerate stone age protection for space age dangers.

In the coming weeks, I will be meeting with Government regulators to discuss yesterday's findings. The question is not, whose fault is this? The question is, how can we eliminate the circumstances that caused these tragedies to happen? The employees of the aerospace industry work hard to protect our country. I think we owe it to them to work hard to protect their health and their life.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nevada has expired.

TV-MARTI

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, last month I introduced S. 375, to provide for television broadcasting of accurate information to the people of Cuba. Joining me in introducing S. 375 were the Senators from Florida, Mr. GRAHAM and Mr. MACK, as well as the junior Senator from New Jersey, Mr. LAUTENBERG, the senior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. KASTEN, and the junior Senator from Connecticut, Mr. LIEBERMAN.

Mr. President, I ask that the senior Senator from South Dakota, Mr. PRESSLER, both of the Senators from Nevada, Mr. REID and Mr. BRYAN, the senior Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN, the junior Senator from Delaware, Mr. BIDEN, the junior Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. NICKLES, the junior Senator from Illinois, Mr. SIMON, the junior Senator from Idaho, Mr. SYMMS, and the junior Senator from Kentucky, Mr. MCCONNELL, be added as cosponsors of Senate S. 375.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time under morning business has expired.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session to resume consideration of the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of John Goodwin Tower, of Texas, to be Secretary of Defense.

The Senate resumed consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr STEVENS. Mr. President, I raised yesterday and I want to raise again today the question of what are we doing. What are we really doing here?

Let me tell the Senate that I had the former Senators who have become Cabinet officers researched for this century, starting in 1909 with Phlander Knox, down to John Tower in 1989.

Think of this history: Knox, Secretary of State, 1909, nominated on the 5th of March, confirmed on the 5th of March; Fall, Interior Secretary, 1921, nominated the 4th of March, confirmed the 4th of March; Weeks for War in 1921, nominated on the 4th of March, confirmed on the 4th of March; New at the Post Office, 1923, nominated February 27, confirmed February 27; Kellogg, Secretary of State, 1925, nominated February 14, confirmed February 16; Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, 1933, nominated March 4, confirmed March 4; Claude Swanson, Navy Department, 1933, nominated March 4, confirmed March 4; James F. Byrnes, Secretary of State, nominated July 2, confirmed July 2; Schwellenbach, Labor Secretary, 1945, nominated May 24, confirmed May 31; McGrath, Attorney General, 1949, nominated August 2, confirmed August 18; John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State, 1953, nominated January 20, confirmed January 21; Fred Seaton, my old boss, Interior Secretary, 1956, nominated May 28, confirmed June 6; William Saxbe, Attorney General, 1973, nominated December 14, confirmed December 19; Ed Muskie, as I mentioned yesterday, Secretary of State, 1980, nominated May 5, confirmed May 7, Richard Schweiker, HHS Secretary, 1981, nominated January 20, confirmed January 21; Bill Brock, Labor Secretary, 1985, nominated April 17, confirmed April 26; Nick Brady, Secretary of Treasury, nominated 1988, August 10, confirmed September 14. There was a recess in that period.

Now John Tower, Defense Secretary, nominated January ,20, it is now March 7, and we are still going along.

For the first time in history, we have strung out the confirmation of a person we served with and knew well.

Mr. President, some people say that it is because of the investigations that are going on. I heard the Senator from Georgia. I have not been one critical of the FBI investigation, but my attention has been called to the Wall Street Journal of this morning, an article entitled "Really, FBI: I have No Dirt on Tower," by Karen Elliott House, who talks about being asked to have an FBI interview concerning a rumor that John Tower propositioned her 17 years ago.

Listen to this. This is a quote from her article, I call this to the attention of Senators because they ought to read it.

> For one thing, a process of rumors begetting rumors offers anyone with the slightest shred of gossip to pass it on through official channels, to instigate additional FBI inquiries and to widen further the web of innuendo in which the senator is snared.

She mentions another lady. Had either she "or I sought to play a mischievious role in the nomination process, we had ample opportunity—indeed an FBI invitation—to do."

> Nothing in this process safeguards the subject of the inquiry from distortions and outright lies except the possibility that such lies might be leaked to the press, causing the accuser's word to be put on record. The irony, of course, is that it would be only the unethical leaking of lies that could expose lies. If the system works in its intended furtive fashion, the word of the liar is protected and the character of the subject may be destroyed.

Mr. President, I said time and time gain that I read that FBI report. I have not been critical of the file, as they now say it should be called. It was a background review of a series of allegations. It takes someone with the ability of having dealt with those files to read through 1 day's series of allegations and interviews and go to 2 or 3 days or a month later to find that that subject has been covered by another series of witnesses and totally rebutted.

I want to talk today slightly about the problem that has been raised by some people concerning drug abuse, as I indicated yesterday.

Parenthetically, I might say that one of our colleagues said that there is no smoking gun but there are a lot of empty shells on the ground. I guess that could happen. My mind turned last night to the picture of a photographer taking pictures of ducks and having a game warden come up and finding a bunch of empty shells on the ground and a dead duck out there. That is this case.

Mr. President, the problem is that the Senate is jumping to conclusions based upon a series of reports that it does not understand.

For instance, Mr. President, I challenge anyone to find an interview with a professional dealing with alcohol abuse in this record. So I decided, as I indicated yesterday, to go back and look at this question about nuclear weapon personnel reliability and what does it mean in terms of this record.

Alcohol abuse in the directive of the Department of Defense, Directive No. 5210, says this: "Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility or personal relationships."

I challenge anyone again to go to the FBI report and find any indication of any of those things that have been established by items in those files concerning John Tower. There is no evidence of alcohol abuse in this file.

There is a lot of talk about people having seen John Tower having had too much to drink.

One of my young assistants last night spoke with the executive director of the Alcohol and Drug Problems Association of North America. She reported to me this morning that this person stated he does not know how anyone could diagnose drug and alcohol problems without being a qualified personnel who conducted an evaluative interview with the cooperation of the patient.

There has been a lot of loose talk out here about alcohol abuse, about John Tower's alcohol abuse, about John Tower's having an alcohol problem.

Let me tell you this person said he was astounded that no Member of Congress, having spent some 24 years around John Tower, having worked with him, using this person's words, "cheek to jowls, so to speak," no one can come up with any anecdotal information on John Tower.

I was a witness, in effect, for John Tower on the floor. This person heard me make my statements these last few days. He sent word to me that I was correct, that those who know a person who is alcohol dependent would observe a change in behavior, a change in the pattern or the efficiency of the individual.

Mr. President, my mind went back again to some Senators I have known here in the Senate who have been impaired. I saved one Senator one day who almost fell in the path of a subway, he was so intoxicated. I have spent time in the steam room with Senators who were intoxicated. One of my great friends from the past, who is now deceased, the first day I was in the Senate, he was so intoxicated he had to lean on my shoulder to walk over to the other building, to the Senate Office Building.

Now what this person is telling us is we could not have lived with John Tower as we did without having seen some evidence of alcohol dependency if he has a problem.

And then I got back to just the inference here is that a man that drinks alcoholic beverages ought to be disqualified from being Secretary of Defense. And somehow or other, the impression has been given that the Department of Defense directives would take anyone who has had too much to drink on an occasion or so and eject that person from the program. That is not the program, Mr. President. And people are coming out here and making statements that are not corroborated by the facts.

I think I know a little bit about alcohol, too. It is a changing society. When I went overseas to China, Mr. President, in World War II, we were given monthly PX supplies, a ration, so to speak. And in those rations were at least two bottles of whiskey a month. Now we have some indication that if a person drinks on occasion, he ought not to be considered a Cabinet officer.

Mr. President, when I came back from those combat missions—and all my colleagues did at the time, my fellow pilots—we were entitled to 2 or 3 ounces of whiskey after every combat flight. We did not take it. The flight surgeon was smart. He said, "If you all save this up, we could have a real squadron party once in a while and everybody can enjoy this whiskey we get, not just you pilots." And we had some really wing-bang parties in China.

I wonder how those would look on my FBI report now. If I were nominated, would they go back and ask the guys that flew with me in World War II, "Did you ever see that guy get drunk?" It is just the same as going back and asking this young woman if, 17 years ago, John Tower propositioned her.

Incidentally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Wall Street Journal be printed in the RECORD, along with the list that I read of the Senators who have been confirmed by the Senate and the time it has taken to confirm them.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 7, 1989]

REALLY, FBI: I HAVE NO DIRT ON TOWER

(By Karen Elliott House)

I was a source for the Federal Bureau of Investigation's probe of Sen. John Tower. And, if my experience is in any way typical of the 500 or more interviews conducted by FBI agents in compiling the secret dossier on Sen. Tower's career and character, the U.S. Senate is pursuing its debate on the basis of rumor, gossip and innuendo that any American citizen clearly would consider character assassination. This secret FBI report, of course, is the eye of the hurricane engulfing Sen. Tower's nomination to be secretary of defense in the Bush administration.

Since not one of 100 senators, many of whom have served, worked and traveled with John Tower for decades, has testified to any firsthand knowledge of his alleged drinking and skirt-chasing, it is the FBI report that is being wielded as the murder weapon to destroy not only his nomination but his name. Thus, it seems instructive to senators and citizens to recount one FBI interview, how it originated, what it produced and most important, how easy it would have been to pile additional innuendo on the bonfire around which the Senator is gleefully dancing.

A 17-YEAR-OLD RUMOR

My interview began with a call one afternoon a few weeks ago from a polite FBI agent, requesting a meeting. I guessed the topic was John Tower. Two days earlier I had received a call from the Los Angeles Times correspondent in Houston requesting a copy of a newspaper article that he had been told contained an account of John Tower propositioning me 17 years ago when I was a young Washington correspondent for The Dallas Morning News. I had indeed written a lengthy profile of Sen. Tower during his re-election campaign in 1972 in which I queried him on rumors of his frequent appearances with women other than his wife and on several auto accidents in which he was involved. It might have been a better story if Sen. Tower had propositioned me, but he didn't.

The only offer I ever had from Sen. Tower was a polite and public invitation to me and by inference a table of Dallas Morning News colleagues to join him for "jazz and scrambled eggs" after a White House correspondents' dinner 17 years ago—an invitation I declined and which seems as innocuous in retrospect as it did at the time. But the rumor mill was obviously grinding away.

Within hours of the FBI phone call, two polite but persistent young agents, one male, one female, showed up at my New York office for what turned out to be a half-hour interview. They quickly explained they had received an anonymous letter saying that if they wanted "derogatory information on John Tower," to contact me or my then-roommate, Sally Shelton, at the time a legislative assistant to Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D., Texas).

Having passed on the anonymous charge, the FBI agents then graciously offered me anonymity to confirm and expand on it or on any other information I might have about misconduct by Sen. Tower. I declined the offer of anonymity. I also explained that not only did I have no firsthand experience with any misconduct by Sen. Tower, in my reporting efforts 17 years ago to track down similar rumors, I'd been unable to substantiate gossip about Sen. Tower's "womanizing."

So, we now had the odd situation of a reporter who had been unable to confirm rumors about John Tower and other women at that time now being asked by the FBI to anonymously confirm rumors about John Tower propositioning her. With this trail clearly leading nowhere, the agents politely pressed for any other information I might have—or any rumors I might have heard. All I could do was acknowledge that rumors of Sen. Tower's interest in women have abounded in Washington for many years. I suggested that Ms. Shelton, who had worked on Capitol Hill for five years, might be in a better position to speak factually.

The FBI, indeed, did contact Ms. Shelton. In her case, she says, the agents focused their questions on rumors of "sexual harassment" by Sen. Tower of another of her roommates who worked in the Senate. Ms. Shelton, now a retired ambassador, says she was startled to be queried about events so distant and distorted. She says she explained to the FBI that she had heard rumors of the senator's "womanizing," but nothing about Sen. Tower sexually harassing women staffers on Capitol Hill.

Ms. Shelton is as perplexed as I am by the rumor process that has led us to be even peripherally involved in the Tower investigation. The experience also leads to some other reflections. For one thing, a process of rumors begetting rumors offers anyone with the slightest shred of gossip to pass it on through official channels, to instigate additional FBI inquiries and to widen further the web of innuendo in which the senator is snared. Had either Ms. Shelton or I sought to play a mischievous role in the nomination process, we had ample opportunity—indeed an FBI invitation—to do so.

Nothing in this process safeguards the subject of the inquiry from distortions and outright lies except the possibility that such lies might be leaked to the press, causing the accuser's word to be put on record. The irony, of course, is that it would be only the unethical leaking of lies that could expose lies. If the system works in its intended furtive fashion, the word of the liar is protected and the character of the subject may be destroyed.

SAFEGUARDS OF JOURNALISM

Journalism also relies to some extent on confidential interviews and anonymous information. But there are critical differences. Good journalism encourages people to speak on the record and offers confidentiality only as a last resort. Good journalism requires double- and triple-sourcing for publication of any controversial information. Good journalism requires that the target of criticism be presented with the specific charges and that a response be included in the original article. Finally, the most important, the article lands in the public domain where the reporter's reputation is on the line for the veracity of sources. None of these protections are available to Sen. Tower in the FBI's investigatory process.

Beyond all this is the substantive issue of what possible difference it can make to the Senate or the American citizenry whether Sen. Tower did or did not pursue or proposition a woman 17 years ago—or for that matter 17 weeks ago. There may indeed be substantive issues at stake in this nomination and those might include current or recent alcohol abuse or illegal conflict of interest as a consultant to defense corporations.

But so far there is no evidence of any laws or rules being broken during Mr. Tower's period as a defense consultant. As for alcohol abuse, the conclusive proof that he isn't an alcoholic would seem to rest with his fellow senators themselves—none of whom has stood up to say that in decades of working with Mr. Tower in all sorts of places at all kinds of hours, he has ever seen the former senator drunk. It begs credulity that any alcoholic could hide his addiction for that long from that many colleagues. Perhaps it is for this reason that so much of the current debate is focusing on the alleged character flaw of a weakness for women.

And, to the extent that my involvement in the womanizing issue is one small strand in the pattern under debate, the tapestry of John Tower being woven for and by the Senate is a tapestry of rumor, gossip and innuendo.

John Tower, Defense Secretary, 1989, January 20-?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my friend is not an alcoholic. My friend John Tower does not have an alcohol problem. My friend John Tower, in the record that is upstairs in S-407 that everyone is talking about, if anyone reads it thoroughly, has not had any instance reported to us where he had been the subject of alcohol abuse.

Is it time to recess, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, it is.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of 12:30 p.m. having arrived, under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2:15 p.m.

Thereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2:15 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. BINGAMAN].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I ask the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, just before the recess, I was speaking—and I will not speak very much longer—and I just wanted to complete those thoughts if I may. First, however, let me tell the Members of the Senate, I assume everyone has this letter from my good friend P.X. Kelley, retired general and former Commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps. Mr. President, I was called last evening by a friend, who is a long way away, who said, "What is all this stuff you are putting in the RECORD?" The comment was made that "people who read that RECORD may know what you are putting in there, but I don't follow what you are putting in. What are you putting in there?"

Let me read this letter if I may from P.X. Kelley. It will not take but a minute.

Last Wednesday, 19 retired Generals and Admirals from the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps, all of whom have known the Honorable John Tower for many years, forwarded a telegram to the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, strongly supporting the nomination for Secretary of Defense of this exceptional American. I believe that this act is unprecedented in the history of our Country, and have attached a copy of the text for your examination.

I have known Senator Tower professionaly, socially, and personally for over a decade, and one of my sincerest regrets is that I retired before having an opportunity to serve under him while he is our Secretary of Defense. It is my strong conviction that history will identify him as one of the greatest patriots and statesmen of our generation.

I urge you to judge Senator Tower on his unique professional qualification to lead our defense establishment. The young men and women who today are serving in the uniform of their Country deserve to have John Tower at the helm.

I am sending this same letter to all members of the United States Senate.

With warmest best wishes, I am,

Most respectfully,

P.X. KELLEY.

Mr. STEVENS. May I just complete the statement I want to make?

Mr. FOWLER. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator shall state his objection.

Mr. FOWLER. But has the Senator concluded his remarks or had he not?

Mr. STEVENS. No, I have not completed them.

Mr. FOWLER. I am just asking for information.

I will not object. The Senator has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do not understand the interception of the Senator from Georgia. I think I have the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. The Senator has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska retains the floor.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield for a question.

Mr. STEVENS. I do want to finish this, if I may.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield for a question.

Mr. STEVENS. One quick question.

Mr. COHEN. Does the Senator's statement or letters contain a transcript of the press conference held by General Kelley and General Davis and Admiral Holloway?

Mr. STEVENS. No, it does not.

Mr. COHEN. I ask whether or not he would be willing to include at the conclusion of his remarks a copy of the transcript of these gentlemen?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that be added in addition to the letter that I just put in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRANSCRIPT

General P.X. KELLEY. Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. First, I would like to thank you very much for being here on such short notice. I'm P.X. Kelley, former Commandant of the United States Marine Corps. With me are Admiral James Holloway, former Chief of Naval Operations and was also a member of the very prestigious Packard Commission and General Bennie Davis, former Commander in Chief, Strategic Air Command and who I have officially known over two decades.

First, I'd like to read a telegram that was sent to our Commander in Chief, the President, this past Wednesday—copies of which I have given you.

"To the President:

"We have served as Generals and Flag Officers in the Armed Forces of the United States.

"We commanded the military forces upon whose successful performance the security of the American people depends.

"We know John Tower well, and have known him for many years.

"In our relationships with John Tower, we have found him to be superbly qualified in every respect, both professionally and personally, to serve the Nation as Secretary of Defense and in the chain-of-command. We would be honored to serve under him, and the uniformed men and women of our country would unquestionably benefit from his leadership.

"We strongly support your nomination of this exceptional American."

This telegram was signed by 19 retired Generals and Admirals, and I'd just like to quickly run through their names to give you a flavor of just who they were.

General Robert H. Barrow, USMC (Ret.). My predecessor as Commandant of the Marine Corps, an exceptional combat hero in three wars.

General Richard E. Cavasos, USA (Ret.). A very, very well respected member of the Hispanic community.

General Bennie L. Davis, USAF (Ret.). Standing to my left who I have mentioned as former Commander in Chief of our Strategic Air Command.

General Raymond G. Davis, USMC (Ret.). Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps, a resident of the State of Georgia, and Medal of Honor winner from Korea.

I've known John Tower since 1974, and I would keep the same elaborations that appeared regularly before the Armed Services Committee to testify. And from that time I was impressed with John Tower's ability as a member of that Armed Services Committee. After my retirement, I maintained an association with John Tower. I consider myself a good friend, and my respect for his abilities, his leadership, has grown as I have observed him as Chairman of the Armed Services Committee. As a matter of fact, I've supported John Tower for the position of Secretary of Defense ever since we asked the Republican Administration as a possibility. I supported him because of his intellect, his intelligence, integrity, his experience, and his toughness.

I was delighted when President Bush nominated him for the position of Secretary of Defense. I have to say that I've become shocked and disillusioned and outraged at the slanderous allegations that have jeopardized his nomination. I've never seen John Tower under the influence of liquor, I've never seen John Tower conduct himself with impropriety toward a woman. I'm absolutely convinced he is in every respect, the best qualified person today to serve as our secretary of defense. And I'm here right now to offer my full support on John Tower's behalf because I frankly consider it to be my public duty. Thank you.

Gen. DAVIS. I too have known John Tower for many, many years. I first encountered John Tower back in 1968 when I was flying combat in southeast Asia. John Tower, who I am sure most of you know, made one of his many trips to southeast Asia to provide that [inaudible] presence among the troops who were then deployed and in combat. I have known John Tower for over more than 20 years, very closely, when I headed Air Force Personnel and John Tower as a Senator provided the necessary support for all of our people programs. He was one of the first spokesman to increase the use of women in the service, and in particularly the United States Air Force. At the Air Force Training Command, which is headquartered in Texas, San Antonio Texas, and its base structure is in Texas across the south east, John Tower made many, many visits to my bases. I have never seen John Tower inebriated. I have never seen John Tower on anything but on his best behavior. John Tower is an example, an example that should be followed by all of us. When I was Commander in Chief of the Strategic Air Command, John Tower was mightily interested in the strategic nuclear deterrence of this nation. I can say without reservation, it would be my pleasure to serve in a command chain that had John Tower in it. I don't think there's any question about his superb intellect, in what he brings to the job, with his great knowledge of foreign affairs, with his great knowledge of nuclear matters, and with his great knowledge of alliances throughout the world. I am shocked to read some of the allegations, because in my over 20 years of intimate, knowledge of John Tower's behavior I consider John Tower a moral man, a man of great integrity, and certainly the finest candidate to be secretary of defense of any person that I've know over the last 35 years.

Thank you very much.

Gen. KELLEY. We'd be very happy right now to take any questions that you would like to ask of any of us.

Q. What effect do you think the delay and controversy is having on the Pentagon now, and what lingering damage?

Adm. HOLLOWAY. I don't believe that. As a matter of fact, I don't believe that because as we all know, he is participating in policy discussions, in budget discussions, and full discussions with the Pentagon and laying out the policies that have been enunciated by the President.

Q. Do any of you feel that even if he wins this battle and is confirmed, the Pentagon's budget fight [inaudible] victims would be damaged because they would have a wounded Secretary of Defense.

Gen. KELLEY. Absolutely not, John Tower is not wounded by anybody or anything. John Tower is a very strong, very tough individual, and John Tower will lead the Department of Defense with leadership that will be unparalleled.

Q. Let me just add that there seems to be a feeling that this would be John Tower's budget?

Gen. KELLEY. This is the President's budget. This is the President's program, John Tower as secretary of defense is responsible for enunciating that program to the Congress and he already is aware of the President's positions, his priorities, and is well prepared to carry that message forward.

Q. Gen. Kelley, it appears that by organizing this news conference that you talked to either John Tower or the White House and coordinated in some way what you're doing, and with what they're doing in support of Tower.

Gen. KELLEY. The only three people I talked to to put together this news conference, with the exception of calling the Associated Press and UPI, the only three people I talked to are the two gentleman who are up here with me, and Julie who reserved the room for me, which by the way, all three of us are paying for.

Gen. DAVIS. I think that there is some indication that we had no prior coordination is the fact that the President's Press Secretary is speaking at the same time.

Q. Gentleman, how do you view the current Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee's position that Tower is unfit to serve in a chain of command?

Gen. DAVIS. Well, we certainly disagree with that position, but everybody is entitled to their own views, and we all know and respect Senator Nunn. I've known Senator Nunn for at least ten years, and have appeared before him many, many times in hearings, but we disagree on that point. We think that John Tower is the best qualified person that we know of to be Secretary of Defense.

Adm. HOLLOWAY. Let me point out that we're coming before you as experienced military leaders. I, for example, during the period that I was head of the Navy, served under three Secretaries of Defense. I believe that I have an appreciation for the requirements of that job, and I also consider that I have an understanding of what it takes to make that job effective. From the perspective of the military, I think we are saying we have quite a different view than the present Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and we're up here to tell you that, that we think our view is important and that you should hear it.

Q. Gentleman, I got here late, but if in fact you believe that some of the allegations about Mr. Tower, including his excessive drinking in the 70's and 80's, was solid enough, would you then have questions about him being in a position of—a chain of command—in terms of the nuclear aspect.

Gen. KELLEY: You're asking a real hypothetical question. What we have said, and you did indeed come in late, we said we have 19 General Officers and Admirals who have never seen John Tower under the influence of alcohol.

Q. You still didn't answer the question sir, would someone with an alcoholic problem, or is shown to have one, be unfit based on what you know the military code to be, to be in a position—chain of command—dealing with nuclear weapons?

Gen. DAVIS. I probably had the most direct experience with nuclear weapons over 14 years, four of those as Commander in Chief Strategic Air Command. We had said, and we reiterate, we have no problem with John Tower in a leadership position, no problem with John Tower in the chain of command. John Tower is a man of great integrity, great morals, great honesty and we think he is the best man for the job.

That's it. That's all.

Gen. KELLEY: Thank you all very much.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I had but a few points to make before we recessed. One is to make sure again we know what we are talking about, about John Tower's relationship to alcohol. John Tower does not have an alcohol dependence. No one has ever stated that he did.

I think we must be specific in what we are talking about. Those people who are saying that John Tower has an alcohol problem are stating a problem in their mind, not a medical problem as defined by anyone in this record. There is no evidence in this record that John Tower has an alcohol dependence; but as I have stated in the past, I want to try to ask the Senate to be careful.

As I stated this morning, I am from the generation of World War II. When we were overseas, we received our PX rations, which included whiskey. Everybody I knew drank whiskey overseas. As I said, we were even entitled to a flight allowance after we finished a combat mission.

We have come through two wars since then. The last one, in Vietnam, involved another substance. It involved drugs, particularly marijuana. We are now setting a standard here that this man should not be a Cabinet officer because he has been reported to have used too much alcohol at times. I think I have said that precisely. He, himself, said, "I drank too much at times."

Mr. President, the military regulations pertaining to drug use are very rigid, any single use of marijuana disqualifies a person from continuing to serve in the military. I call attention specifically, for instance, to Navy instruction 5350. That regulation specifies that the first incident of any drug use disqualifies any officer or senior enlisted personnel from further service.

With respect to those people who have served our country in Vietnam: Some Members of this body have said that they used marijuana at one time. Is that a disqualification? Where are we going with these new standards here? Some Senators have mentioned the Department of Defense nuclear weapon personnel reliability regulations, and say that John Tower could not qualify to serve on a nuclear submarine, in their judgment, because in their judgment he has an alcohol problem. The regulations do not support that.

As I read the regulation this morning, "any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage that leads to misconduct, unacceptable social behavior, impairing work performance, physical or mental health problems, financial irresponsibility, personnel relationship problems" are definitions of alcohol abuse—disqualification comes under a different category.

I believe that the Senate—at least some Members of the Senate—is setting standards now that are based upon rumor and innuendo, statements that, in my judgment, by the record, have been totally contradicted, to the point that, in my judgment, I do not see how anyone can reach the conclusion that John Tower has any alcohol problem, as such.

It is my feeling that we ought not set a new standard. It is unique, Mr. President, that with respect to a former Senator, we can stand before the Senate and state here, as Senators, that we have known this man for over 24 years, and none of us, no one person, pro or con, can say that he ever saw John Tower inebriated or out of control, or that he knows of his own knowledge that he had a drinking problem. To the contrary, those of us who knew him very well stated he had none.

Again, let me point out that one of the circumstances that led some people to conclude that John Tower ought not be confirmed were reports concerning Geneva. This is the letter that was specifically objected to by my friend when he called.

Yesterday, I put in the RECORD this letter, and this will be my last comment. I think that Max Kampelman is one of the great Americans of our age. He has dedicated himself, at severe strain to his own health, to be our ambassador in negotiations on many occasions. He was the chief of the U.S. delegation to the nuclear and space arms talks in Geneva. He wrote this letter on March 1. It is in the Washington Post for March 1.

A brief innocuous paragraph at the end of a story [Feb. 23], an abbreviated and distorted leak, and suddenly two fine ladies, hard-working government secretaries, have a cloud hanging over their head. John Tower's two secretaries, to the best of my knowledge, have served our country well. I know of no reason to question that judgment or their character.

Furthermore, without intending to influence or intrude on the prerogatives of the Senate, I will add that I have never seen John Tower intoxicated, out of control or behave in an ungentlemanly manner. We worked closely together in Geneva for 14 months, during which he was at all times a professional in the best sense of that word and a negotiator of skill and sensitivity.

During the past four years of the Nuclear and Space Arms Talks in Geneva, more than 100 Americans have served their country, under my direction, with zeal, dedication, competence and patriotism. The American people, Congress and the press should not permit rumors and innuendo to distort the extraordinarily fine service performed by these men and women. I am proud of them, and so should we all be proud of them.

MAX M. KAMPELMAN.

WASHINGTON.

Mr. President, there is another man who served in a unique relationship to John Tower: 14 months, long meetings with the Soviets, long staff meetings afterward. I have been at meetings in their office at 7 in the morning, and I have been with them until 11 or 12 o'clock at night. No one will ever really comprehend the dedication of these people. If there ever was a time when anyone had a chance, even better than those of us who served with him for so long, to know John Tower, Max Kampelman knows John Tower. I am really proud to have this letter from that fine American to put in the RECORD once again.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I intend to spend just a few minutes explaining some of my views on the Tower nomination at this time.

First, I want to just point to the FBI report with respect to certain allegations. Some say that it is more than an allegation, and I believe the report refutes what the Senator from Alaska just said about Mr. Tower and the "drinking problem." The committee report states on page 10:

The record of the FBI report and the committee's own review show a clear pattern of excessive drinking and alcohol abuse by Senator Tower during the 1970's.

Senator Tower and his close associates and friends have conceded that Senator Tower had a drinking problem in the 1970's. Even the administration has acknowledged that the nominee had a pattern of excessive drinking during this period. There is substantial evidence that this pattern continued in the 1980's.

So it is a little bit of an exaggeration to leave the record stating that nobody can show that Senator Tower had any drinking problem ever. Senator Tower, himself, says that he did, and that is to his credit. As anybody knows who has dealt with people who have a drinking problem, or other abuse problems, the first step to solving it is to admit it. Senator Tower has done that.

Let me point out, also, Mr. President, in reference to retired military people an organization known as High Frontier. The director is Lt. Gen. Daniel O. Graham. He was critical of Mr. Tower because of his failure to be strong enough, as the nominee for the Secretary of Defense, on the strategic defense initiative. He also had some other reservations.

I want to read a letter that he wrote to Jack Rosenthal, the editor of the New York Times, dated February 20, 1989. This letter indicates that there are a few retired officers from the military who have some real qualms here. The letter reads:

DEAR SIR: Your story on the John Tower confirmation issue (18 Feb. 1989) left the impression that while I am concerned with Tower's lukewarm position on SDI, I have no problem with his personal reputation. That is not the case.

I am very much concerned with Mr. Tower's reputation for drinking and womanizing. No officer in any of the military services would expect to be promoted if he had such a reputation. Any ranking officer that acquired such a reputation could expect to be asked to resign.

Senators should consult some retired military leaders on this matter before they vote on Mr. Tower's confirmation. Every retired officer with whom I have discussed this matter agrees with me that Tower's confirmation as Secretary of Defense would be a serious detriment to the morale of the officer corps of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines.

This is not to say that all military leaders are sober and chaste. Far from it. But the officer corps has yet to lower its standards to the point where Mr. Tower's reputation would be tolerated.

President Bush has certainly proven his loyalty to a political ally—it is time that ally proved his loyalty to Mr. Bush by withdrawing. Mr. Tower should realize that the sensationalist sector of the press will never let the issue of his personal reputation die, a fact that will severely damage his effectiveness as Secretary of Defense.

Sincerely,

DANIEL O. GRAHAM,
Lieutenant General, USA (Ret.)

Mr. President, there are always two sides to every story and certainly that is what this debate is all about. This debate should insure that all sides are exposed, all questions are asked, and all information made available.

Mr. President, when the Senate votes on the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense, I am going to vote against the nominee. After careful deliberation and consulting with President Bush, I cannot in good conscience or without serious reservations, support this nominee.

In the context of deciding on this vote, one standard that we should consider is the importance of the position of Secretary of Defense and Senator Tower's suitability for this post. The responsibilities of a Secretary of Defense are highly unique and vastly different from any other Cabinet post. We should seek, and the American people deserve, a candidate who is highly qualified, morally and ethically sound, and capable of leading the armed services of this great Nation.

Reasonable people might disagree on this vote. I understand that. But in regard to Senator Tower's personal conduct, discretion, and judgment, we should carefully review the substantial and corroborated evidence on the nominee's character and attitude toward the use of alcohol and the treatment of individuals. This is a highly sensitive and extremely important post. We must not have doubts, hesitations, or reservations. We cannot take a chance on this vote.

There are three basic reasons why I believe Senator Tower is not the proper person for this sensitive position in these critical times. It is the cumulative influence of all three factors that preclude me from supporting this nominee. I will expand more on these reasons throughout the statement.

First, I am deeply concerned about the appearance of a conflict of interest and the ethical propriety of Senator Tower moving quickly from U.S. arms negotiator to defense consultant for numerous corporations. In testimony before the Armed Services Committee, Senator Tower said he provided "information on the implications of our arms control negotiations on future product development." This is from the report. This perception erodes needed public confidence in the integrity of Government service. I have a judgment to make—I think this is wrong. Americans deserve better in a Secretary of Defense.

Second, we are faced with a defense procurement scandal, Project Ill Wind, sweeping through the Pentagon right now. We need reform in acquisition and placement strategy. The American public will not support a Defense Department which participates in highly suspect procurement practices. Also, we may have to vote for some prudent cuts in defense spending, especially on programs which do not show promise for the future. This demands public confidence and support. As this nomination has dragged on over 3 months, Senator Tower is not the right person to lead the Defense Department through these difficult times in my judgment.

Third, I believe that Senator Tower has not exhibited the prudent judgment and sound decisionmaking demanded of a Secretary of Defense. His general demeanor has demonstrated a lack of respect for individuals. This can be pronounced when it is combined with an abuse of alcohol. His attitude toward alcohol would erode morale and leadership, critical ingredients for the role of Secretary of Defense, as pointed out by Lieutenant General Graham.

The responsibilities of this post are unlike those of any other Cabinet official. The Secretary oversees the largest budget of any department, directs our Armed Forces, and manages our national security. We should apply stringent standards to any and all nominees to this post. Let me cite an example of the Secretary's responsibility under the law as contained in title X of the United States Code, section 113:

> The Secretary is the principal assistant to the President on all matters related to the Department of Defense and is subject to the direction of the President. He has authority, direction, and control over the Department of Defense.

In section 162 goes on and says:

> In regard to the chain of command, unless otherwise directed by the President, the chain of command to a unified or Combatant command runs—(1) from the President to the Secretary of Defense, and (2) from the Secretary of Defense to the Combatant command."

Mr. President, day or night, 365 days per year, we are relying on the prudent and sound judgment of this Secretary to advise a President on a potential crisis. This could be a situation similar to the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut, the invasion of Grenada, or a scenario involving nuclear confrontation with terrorists or a Third World country.

The Secretary, in addition to exemplary qualifications, judgment, and personal conduct, must set the highest examples in leadership for the men and women of the Armed Forces. Let me cite an example of the enlisted requirements for the Army, under the direction of the Secretary. According to Army regulation 40-501, Standards of Medical Fitness, chapter 1, section 2-35:

> The causes for rejection for appointment, enlistment, and induction are—drug abuse characterized by—

These are stringent and demanding criteria. I am sure that the Marines, Navy, and Air Force requirements are equally as vigorous as the one I just read. In demanding our recruits to excel, we must be equally demanding of our leaders. These are not capricious and arbitrary standards that have been set up. These are specific and enforced Army regulations.

These are not double standards practiced by Congress. Members of Congress are often defeated for reelection for some of these very reasons. We are scrutinized, evaluated, and judged in political campaigns.

We have to answer these questions, and we do it every 2 years or every 6 years as the case may be.

Senators should rely on their firsthand knowledge of Senator Tower as well as the FBI report to evaluate his activities and character. The White House has said that the report shoots down allegations against Senator Tower. The ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee, the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Senator WARNER, said that reasonable people can draw different conclusions from that report. He is absolutely correct, and I agree with the Senator from Virginia.

We should be able to make determinations based upon the entire record. The American people should be able to read a sanitized version of this report and decide whether Senator Tower meets the criteria for Secretary of Defense.

I feel certain that if this report were made available, the public would be outraged that this Senate is considering confirming him as Secretary of Defense.

I think that if this report were released—and I hope the President, the minority leader and Mr. Tower will agree to release it—that many who so bravely come to defend Tower's nomination would back down. I believe they would be ashamed to defend such a report.

Make no mistake, Mr. President, the FBI report and the majority and minority reports contain specific corroborated evidence of wrongdoing and poor judgment by the nominee. It is there and it is in black and white. Yes, there is a lot of other material to be read. But I challenge anybody to let that record be shown here in its entirety. Only then can we see how strong or weak the support is in favor of this nominee.

If anyone wants to overlook such evidence, that is their judgment. I respect that. We all have to make subjective decisions. But no one who has read these reports can say that there is no substantiated evidence relating to John Tower's conduct.

That report covers a massive sort of different allegations, some substantiated and some not, and some very positive things about Senator Tower. These include statements from relatives, former relations that he has had with men and women in the military and out of the military that are very positive. It also has some very strong statements from some political people on the same side of the aisle as Senator Tower that will just shock you if you take the time to read it. If then, you conclude that this man should be Secretary of Defense, I will strongly disagree.

This is why I challenge the supporters of Senator Tower to request President Bush and Senator Tower to authorize the release of that report today. We must inform the public of what has been said. We must allow the public to judge with us now because, as we have all seen the last few days, everybody wants to point the finger at the report whenever they do not like what is in it. They also point at it if they do like what it is in it. And we are all paralyzed here because that report is locked up under executive privilege.

The President asked the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the ranking member to agree that it would not be released. They agreed. Now it is up to the President to ask them to let it be released. That is what is going to make the difference here. And that is what is going to change, in my judgment, what the people think of this nomination.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield without losing the right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the Senator know I have introduced a resolution to establish a bill of rights for nominees? We would refer this nomination back to the Armed Services Committee and then we would have a conference. Every witness you would want to hear, you call. Every witness that Tower wants to hear, he will call. We will have some cross-examination, and we will get it out on the record.

I do not believe in violating the concept of releasing FBI reports or files. It never has been done; never been done, to my knowledge. And the President has a reason for asking us to not release it, because the people that come forward to give comments to the FBI do it on a confidential basis.

It is up to each one of us to judge what is in that file. But I think in this instance we have established a new norm and we should take this back to committee and let us have what you want, let us put it out on the record, every one you want to come in and tell the public that John Tower did something wrong and have it be subject to cross-examination and I will be pleased to help with the cross-examination.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator for that. I think that is a good idea. I also would be glad to participate in the cross-examination. Because in my judgment the only reason I think the case demands that we release that report is because we are constantly cited with that report. They say that there is nothing there. That it shoots down everything. And those on the other side know it does not.

The report is not in total opposition to Senator Tower, either. As I said, I read all the positive and negative things and I made my judgment that there is enough corroborating evidence. For somebody to stand here and say there is nothing in that report that is corroborated, there is nothing in there that is substantiated, is just not the case. And if we cannot have the report, how are we going to make a judgment outside of this body?

So it is time we stop using the report. We have the Senate report that is made available, a public report. You can read that, as I just read. Testimony in that, even from Senator Tower, indicated that he himself says he had a problem with alcohol in the 1970's.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DECONCINI. I will yield, reserving the right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator yields for a question.

Mr. SPECTER. As the distinguished Senator from Arizona characterizes his view of the report, which is totally different from mine, you paint a very dark, really black picture. How can you say, then, that reasonable minds could differ on an interpretation of that report the way the Senator has characterized it?

Mr. DECONCINI. I will be glad to answer that. If you read that report as I read it and you find a host of information there of interviews that are very positive toward the former Senator from Texas, including his former wife, his first wife, including a number of admirals and the military people, including some business people. You have to take that and weigh that as I weighed it, and I think we all did. You also then have some allegations that are not substantiated.

I have read a lot of criminal reports and a lot of FBI reports as a prosecutor and as a Member of this body and you get what you can weigh and what you can throw out. It is not difficult to determine whether or not there is a witness or whether or not you should rely on this confidential witness. And you can even find out in some instances who they are if you want to go ask the White House, as some Members have.

Then you read the ones that are substantiated and you make your judgment. Different people can come to different conclusions. I came to a conclusion that there is substantiated evidence there, there is unsubstantiated evidence, and there is positive evidence. To me there is too much there to take a risk on this appointment.

Mr. SPECTER. I would ask this as a followup, if I may. The distinguished Senator from Arizona comments about how Senators ought to use their own knowledge, and on that I agree with him. I read that FBI file very differently than did the Senator from Arizona. My reading is that each one of the allegations really disintegrates on close analysis, just as the three examples have disintegrated when they have been brought onto this floor after newspaper leaks—the so-called ballerina, Sergeant Jackson, and the businessman from Arizona.

But the question that I have for the Senator from Arizona turns on our own experiences, the experience of the Senator from Arizona as well as the experience of the Senator from Pennsylvania, on seeing Senator Tower on the floor of the U.S. Senate on so many occasions.

The Senator from Arizona came here after the 1976 election. This Senator came after the 1980 election. I have tabulated the late night votes where Senator Tower was on the floor. From 1981 through 1984, there were 59 votes after midnight. There were 36 votes between 11 p.m. and 12 p.m., 44 votes between 10 and 11, 52 votes between 9 and 10.

To particularize them to a slight extent, on May 14, 1982, Senator Tower managed the Department of Defense authorization bill where there were votes at 1:11 a.m., 1:39 a.m., 3:04 a.m., 4:55 a.m., and 5:12 a.m.

On July 23, 1982, we had the tax bill. There were votes on that day at 12:43 a.m., 1:29 a.m., 2:07 a.m., 2:34 a.m., 3:02 a.m., 3:31 a.m., 4:10 a.m., 4:30 a.m.

I could repeat these times at great length.

I know that Senator Tower was on the floor on all of those occasions, as was I. And noting the excellent voting record of the Senator from Arizona, I believe he was on the floor at the same time, although I have not checked the Senator's attendance.

My question is this: In the light of these hundreds and hundreds of votes in the late evening hours or through the night, in the presence of the Senator from Arizona and in the presence of some 70, 80, 90 of our colleagues, is not the fact that not one Member of this body ever noticed Senator Tower under the influence of alcohol much more persuasive than even the characterization of the FBI file by the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. DECONCINI. Let me answer that question. That is the first time that question has been posed that I know of, whether or not he was under the influence or whether or not he was inebriated.

I have seen Senator Tower under the influence of alcohol, and under control, as I have seen other Members of this body.

So, if my colleague wants to know have I seen him under the influence of alcohol, the answer is "yes." I cannot give my colleague the date, but I have seen him right here as I have seen other Members.

Was he inebriated to the point he could not operate? The answer is no. But let me read, from the committee report in response to what the Senator asked. This is what the committee said regarding what Senator Tower said before the Armed Services Committee:

Senator Tower, and close associates and friends, have conceded Senator Tower had a drinking problem in the 1970's

He was in the Senate in the 1970's. I was not, but he was serving in the Senate. Well, I was in the Senate in the last part of the 1970's.

He himself admits that he had a drinking problem. As the Senator understands alcoholism, and I know he does, many people who have drinking problems do not admit it or carry it around with them in public for good reason.

Mr. SPECTER. Is the Senator representing——

Mr. DECONCINI. Please let me just finish. The FBI report goes further and cites some instances where he was reported after coming off the floor, and the Senator has to make his own judgment whether he thought those were substantiated or not. I concluded that some instances were and some were not.

Mr. SPECTER. Is the Senator from Arizona representing he has seen Senator Tower, either inebriated or under the influence of alcohol on the floor of the Senate—let me finish the question—so that he was impaired from performing his duties as a U.S. Senator?

Mr. DECONCINI. I just made it very clear and I will make it very clear again. This Senator has seen Senator Tower under the influence of alcohol, as he was seen by other Members. I have not seen him inebriated to the extent he could not perform his duties. I have said that for the second time for the Senator from Pennsylvania so that this is very clear.

Mr. SPECTER. Well, I think that is the critical factor.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, we must let the people decide, in my judgment, on this matter. The only way they are going to decide overwhelmingly, through their elected representatives, is if the FBI report is sanitized and made available to the public. Because this will turn the tide, in my judgment, without a question.

Why do so many fear the release of this report? I will tell you why. Because they know, as I do, what it contains. It is easy to defend or attack reports that are not available to be seen by all of the Senate or all of the public. We must accept the task of answering all the questions that the public now wants to know.

It has been brought out time and time again that the report contains nothing. The President said it shoots everything down. That is just not accurate.

Mr. President, I would like to comment in further detail on my reasons for opposing Senator Tower's nomination. First, I have reservations regarding his intimate connection with the defense contractors. Senator Tower was an arms negotiator for 13 months, participating in some of the most sensitive and delicate policy decisions. These decisions can directly affect military strategies, mobility, deterrence, and future arms control directives.

For example, with respect to mobility, defense contractors are extremely interested in decisions influencing the MX rail garrison and the Midgetman missiles. Advising these companies on probable outcomes of negotiations potentially influence various defense systems entailing millions of dollars. So we are not just talking about appearances. We are talking about reality, what Senator Tower told them.

The publisher of the Phoenix Gazette, Pat Murphy, wrote this article on March 2, 1989. I ask unanimous consent that these articles that I read here, along with General Graham's letter, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DECONCINI. The publisher of the Phoenix Gazette, Pat Murphy, wrote on March 2, 1989:

Can the U.S. taxpayer, plagued by defense contractor scandals and cost overruns, afford to have as the military procurement system's chief custodian a man who sold himself as a consultant for fees totaling more than $1 million?

Senator Tower received $102,860 from LTV Aerospace and Defense Co. in 1988 for monitoring developments on the C-FIN Program. He has completely recused himself from procurement matters and suspension matters on this program. He received $10,000 from Jeffords-McManus in 1988 to monitor developments on the McDonnell Douglas AV-8-B Harrier.

He has recused himself on suspension or debarment proceedings. He received $92,000 in 1988 from Martin-Marietta for his views on the implications of the INF Treaty and current START talks. He has recused himself from any disbarment or suspension proceedings. He has worked for Rockwell, Textron, and British Aerospace for thousands of dollars and recused himself on disbarment or suspension proceedings.

While members of the Armed Services Committee found that Senator Tower did not provide clients with classified information, they did conclude that this situation creates the appearance of using public office for private gain and casts doubt on his ability to command public confidence in the integrity of the Pentagon acquisition process.

This relates to my second concern: The confidence of the public and the confidence of people who work in the Pentagon. I have asked unanimous consent that the following editorials from the Defense News, Army Times, Navy Times, and Air Force Times, commentary in the Navy Times, editorial in the Washington Times, commentary on NBC News, editorial in the Arizona Republic, and article in the Phoenix Gazette be printed in the RECORD. I think they have already been introduced but I want to be sure they appear at the conclusion of my remarks. These articles, generally regarded as highly professional which are read and respected by the Pentagon, all call for Tower to step down. The Defense News wrote:

The principal task of the next Defense Secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent.

The Army Times wrote:

Though the charges against Tower may be unproven, they undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed, he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department, a kind of Mr. Military Industrial Complex.

The Navy Times wrote:

* * * the Senate has an obligation to vote down a nominee when sufficient questions of character are raised.

The Air Force Times put it simply:

John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks a letter from Lt. Gen. Daniel Graham—retired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. He wrote:

Every retired officer with whom I have discussed this matter agrees with me that Tower's confirmation as Secretary of Defense would be a serious detriment to the morale of the officer corps of the Navy, Army, Air Force, and Marines.

In testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Mr. Paul Weyrich, a leading conservative Republican, said that Senator Tower should not be confirmed due to his lack of moral behavior and standards that we expect of a Secretary of Defense. These editorials, letters, and opinions are not partisan publications or representatives from the Democratic Party. This is not a political issue. It appears that politics and partisanship are being used to confuse this issue.

The fact that 11 Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee voted not to confirm him, that is political? The fact that nine Republicans voted to confirm him; that is not political? You cannot have it both ways.

If we are going to have a political fight here, then fine, we will have it. This Senator did not make his judgment upon the politics or partisanship.

Mr. President, the Senate, in its constitutional role of giving advice and consent on Presidential nominations, has not abused this task. Only eight times since our country was founded has a Cabinet nominee been rejected by the Senate.

This is not abusing the privilege. My own record, for instance, on judicial nominees reflects overwhelming support for the President's nominations. During the first 7 years of the Reagan administration, the U.S. Senate voted on 249 judicial nominees under article 3. I voted for the President's choice 99.14 percent of the time. This Senator generally does not decide on political considerations.

We must oppose the President's nominee, and I think most Members here oppose it for some of the same reasons.

The American people are concerned about this particular problem. They are concerned about ethics in Government.

The Reagan administration had scores of officials leaving office under a cloud of ethical problems. Some were indicted, some convicted of felonies, some even served time; most were put on probation. President Bush declared a new time, a new era for ethics in Government.

At this time, 13 of the President's Cabinet nominees have been unanimously approved in the Senate. The only vote against Bush's nominee has been cast by a Republican.

I truly believe that President Bush is sincere about a new era for ethics, and I hope that he leads by example of his performance in public office. We should continue to seek to attract and recruit people for Government service who are not questioned, who are highly qualified, who exhibit moral and ethical leadership, who show judgment in decisionmaking and deserve the trust of the American people. We must not lower our standards. We cannot compromise our expectations. We should apply these qualities and expectations to the most sensitive of all positions in the Defense Department.

Mr. President, I want to rise for another reason here. I rise to commend both Senators, the chairman and the ranking member on the Armed Services Committee. These things are not enjoyable for anybody when you get into these ethical battles that we are proceeding with today. I think Senator WARNER, the ranking member, has conducted himself fairly. He has restrained from any innuendos or inferences toward the chairman, off the floor and on the floor. He deserves congratulations from this Senator.

Likewise, I commend the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. This man did not start out to sink anybody. He did not start out with anything but a proclivity to support the President's nominee. He did not go seeking to find out how he could undermine this nominee or this new administration. There were allegations, there were witnesses, there was testimony brought to his attention, and he had to face it. He had to face them as anybody in this body should, in an objective manner, consulting with his ranking member, and he finally had to make a judgment based on his conscience. I respect his judgment. I respect the ranking member's judgment also. I know they both have struggled with this issue for a long period of time in coming to their conclusions.

We will all get over this. We have been through these things before. Some people say, "Oh, my goodness, what is happening to the U.S. Senate? Are we ever going to get over this burden that we are thrusting upon ourselves?" Yes, we will because we understand what this body is all about. We understand life goes on in and out of the Senate, and we will continue.

I commend Senator NUNN for his leadership and the integrity he has exhibited as chairman of the Armed Services Committee during these proceedings and to this date. This nomination has dominated his schedule for the past 3 months and he has shown patience; he has shown fairness; and he has shown careful deliberation. My colleague from Arizona was quoted as saying he is a very moral man. Indeed, he is. Due to his force of intellect and his attention to detail, he has delayed votes in the committee in order to assure that all the members had all the facts before making a decision on Senator Tower's qualifications.

Some may disagree with Senator NUNN's final decision on President Bush's nominee. Some may debate the Senate's institutional role in considering Cabinet officials, whether or not we should rely on FBI reports, whether or not we should do our own internal investigations and exclude the FBI. Others may editorialize that the standard of conduct for Cabinet nominees has become purely a partisan political struggle, as the Washington Post speculated.

However, recently, the Wall Street Journal reprinted an article from a December 4, 1972, edition of the Atlanta Journal. This article recounted a traffic accident Senator NUNN experienced on October 31, 1964. This accident occurred 25 years ago, and no one was hurt. It involved a car driven by a young lawyer by the name of SAM NUNN and a parked car. The Wall Street Journal went on to write an editorial which directly implied that Chairman NUNN has double standards and says, "Washington has developed a new gutter standard when considering Cabinet appointees." That is hogwash, and we all know it. I believe the Wall Street Journal descended to the tabloid-type journalism with this type of unwarranted attack on Senator NUNN's judgment and character. This incident is not relevant to the Tower nomination, nor is it relevant to what a fair and thorough paper like the Wall Street Journal ought to report.

The columnists in the Washington Post analyzed and rationalized reasons for the Armed Services Committee vote. The Wall Street Journal dug up a 25-year-old traffic fine. Even candidates running against Senator NUNN in Georgia did not bring this incident up because it was not worthy of mention.

Mr. President, Senator NUNN has performed magnificently. Some might say; "Wait a minute," or maybe they will not say this. I hope they will not. I should not speculate on things out here that would not normally come. Some may say we can certainly question Senator NUNN about 25 years ago if we are going to take a witness who said they saw Senator Tower in certain conditions 17 years ago, and I say we are not here debating Senator NUNN. But I would be more than happy to match his character against that of the nominee, Mr. Tower, anytime, anyplace, FBI report or not, because they are two different people.

We have a record of criticism here of a former Senator. I take that seriously. I understand the rules here. I understand what we do and try to do for each other, and I have no problem with that in the general sense. We do our level best to be objective with our colleagues presently serving and those who have left.

On occasion, when a Member has been criminally under siege here, I think we have acted responsibly. Maybe the Member who is no longer serving with us has not. I believe we have. The Ethics Committee takes seriously the questions they ask. Though they are criticized now and then from the press that this is an internal operation to protect its Members it is not. The Ethics Committee consists of people who did not volunteer for the job. The Senator from New Hampshire is one of those standing on the floor right now. They take it very seriously and sometimes each Senator can hold different views. It is up to each individual Senator to decide.

That is the issue in this case. Each Member individually has to reach a judgment here. I respect those who come down on the other side. I am not going to argue a case after this is finished why they did that or why they did this. But this Senator searched hard and considered all the information. This Senator would have liked to have supported the President's nominee here. I talked to him about it at some length.

I always begin with the presumption that the President is entitled to his nominee and that there must be substantive evidence, there must be compelling reasons to come to a conclusion that the President ought not to have his nominee. As a lawyer, I understand this presumption and I think I understand the burden of proof. I would only reiterate, the burden of proof is in the FBI file. It is overwhelming. It ought to be made public and, I dare say, if it is made public, there will be little more debate on the issue. I thank the Chair.

TOWER SHOULD STEP ASIDE

Mr. John Tower should withdraw his name from consideration to be defense secretary of the United States. It would be a service to the country and to the president. Withdrawal would be the act of a seasoned politician who understands that the best interest of the nation sometimes require personal sacrifice by those who would help lead it.

Withdrawal is necessary because the record of Mr. Tower's professional life raises substantive doubt that he can perform with utmost effectiveness at a time when defense priorities and the Defense Department each are undergoing periods of vital, but delicate, change.

The nation's ability to mount a robust defense depends, over the long term, on the support of the American people. Support for defense spending is declining. The public is raising legitimate questions about the relationship between the Defense Department and the defense industry. Further, defense no longer is the nation's top priority as was the case in 1981 when President Reagan accelerated the defense buildup begun by his predecessor. Today, defense is one of a number of national priorities, which include reduction of the federal deficit and improvement of the nation's trade balances.

What is needed is a defense secretary with the political skills to raise public confidence in the Pentagon and the acquisition process. He should have the vision to unite NATO's quarrelsome allies and address their changing and diverging defense priorities in light of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's entreaties. The new secretary must possess the diplomatic and leadership skills to build an international consensus for the president's defense agenda.

While in the Senate, Mr. Tower earned a reputation as a tough, abrasive deal maker. Even his allies do not characterize him as one much interested in the opposing views of others. He demonstrated little interest in improving the acquisition system or in balancing the appetites of former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger with other, equally important, needs of the nation.

But it is his job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling. In about two years, Mr. Tower earned $1 million as a consultant for Rockwell International, Martin Marietta, LTV, Textron, British Aerospace, Astrotech and Hicks and Associates, a consulting firm that advises, among others, the Northrop Corp. These firms are makers of the B-1 and B-2 bombers, the MX and Midgetman missiles, and a wide array of the Pentagon's most important conventional weapons.

Sen. Sam Nunn, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, summarized the issue this way: "Frankly, the difficulty here is not the fact that you have worked for a defense contractor or been a consultant" but that Mr. Tower represented "five or six or seven of the major corporations . . . If you were to [excuse] yourself from [Pentagon discussions involving] all of them, you couldn't be secretary of defense . . . We have a perception problem. The question of conflict is one that usually relates to continuing financial interests. The other is perception . . . I know you to be an honest person. But I do worry about the perception."

The senator worries because he knows that today's public perception is tomorrow's political reality. That is why President Bush established ethics in government as a priority of his administration. After 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the path he had chosen for himself.

The principle task of the next defense secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The defense secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority and reason.

There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times.

[From the Army Times, Feb. 13, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD GO

John Tower should withdraw his nomination to be the next secretary of defense.

Out of concern for the military, which the former Texas senator clearly loves, he should step aside. Tower's public position has been so compromised by the agonizing process by which he was nominated and is being confirmed—as of this writing the Senate Armed Services Committee has postponed its vote on the matter—that he cannot be the strong spokesman the Defense Department needs now.

We are reluctant to pass judgment on Tower's character per se. It takes a judge with more moral clarity than we would claim to reach a definitive verdict on the charges of womanizing and high living that have surfaced along Tower's troubled road to the Pentagon post. Edward Kennedy has survived much more serious charges to serve a long term in the Senate. Are the standards for a defense secretary so much higher than for a senator?

More troubling and more at issue is Tower's position as a consultant to defense contractors. No one has claimed Tower acted illegally in receiving big fees from defense firms in return for what, by Tower's own description, was precious little real information. But the speed and greed which spun through the revolving door is appalling.

Though the charges against Tower may be unproven, they undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed, he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department, a kind of Mr. Military-Industrial Complex.

Balancing this is the "Nixon-goes-to-China" argument. That is, Tower will be able to tame the Pentagon's wasteful ways and make reforms stick because he is a such a long-term supporter of the military. In his confirmation hearings, Tower said, "I understand we must live within constraints. I am not such a mindless hawk that I would come to you and ask you for a substantial increase in defense expenditure when I know it is not going to happen."

Tower recognized that he would be viewed with suspicion in asking for defense increases. But how then can he credibly support the current defense budget, which calls for a 2 percent real increase in spending? And how can he make the argument—which needs desperately to be made by someone—that national security may be more important than this year's Gramm-Rudman number? The United States is about to enter the two most important arms negotiations in history and needs to stick to its guns to reach a successful conclusion.

And to maintain a national consensus on military spending, the Pentagon badly needs to have its image resurrected from the Gologotha where spare parts scandals and Operation III Wind and pique at our allies and many other problems have marooned it. Is John Tower the man to do that?

Alas, no.

It seems cruel to deprive a man with the skills to do a job he desperately wants to do of the opportunity to make good. And we may be making a moot point, as the Senate seems intent on confirming Tower come hell or high water.

But George Bush, who says he cares deeply about ethics in government, might want to reconsider. The president's sense of loyalty may be too strong.

Or Tower may summon personal courage of his own—it would take uncommon courage to refuse now the job he wants so much—to step aside. It might be the best help he can give to his friends in the military.

[From the Navy Times, Mar. 6, 1989]

THE TOWER VOTE

President Bush gambled and apparently lost on the nomination of former Sen. John Tower to be secretary of Defense. The Senate Armed Service Committee sent the nomination to the Senate floor with a recommendation not to confirm.

The vote split along party lines—11 Democrats against Tower, nine Republicans voting in favor of their former colleague. If the partisan pattern holds, the nomination will be defeated in the Senate where Democrats hold a 55-45 majority.

Critics of committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., say with some bitterness that he allowed rumor and innuendo about Tower's social life to rule the day. They suggest that Nunn had his way with Defense when Frank C. Carlucci was secretary, and now he bristles at the thought of so formidable an adversary as Tower taking over that post.

Those charges themselves seem the fruit of politics and bruised egos. As Navy Times went to press, no version of the FBI investigation into Tower's personal habits had been released. The public has no way to assess the material that swayed Democratic conservatives like Nunn and Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, to vote against the nomination. But Sen. John Warner's observation that reasonable men can disagree on the implications of the FBI reports is no ringing denunciation of Nunn's leadership on this issue.

Both Nunn and Tower care deeply about national security and those serving in the armed forces. Tower served with distinction in the Senate for 24 years. He's been a strong supporter of the Sea Services. As a master chief in the Naval Reserve, he holds a special affection for the Navy.

But the Senate has an obligation to vote down a nomination when sufficient questions of character are raised. All those investigations were opportunities to allay the Democrats' concerns. They did not.

The vote in committee came down to two issues. The first is whether Tower is a good choice to handle the tough decisions ahead for defense. He has the brains and background to handle the job.

The second, however, involves leadership, and that includes personal habits. "Will we demand less of our secretary of Defense than we do of our people in uniform?," Glenn asked.

We shouldn't. And military people need to know we won't. The Defense secretary should be, and should be known to be, a man of upstanding character. President Bush should nominate another to lead the Defense Department.

If he does not, the full Senate should reject the nomination.

NOT TOWER

The armed forces are under great pressure. They are being forced to find ways to hold down spending without endangering the nation, and they must rebuild public trust in the flawed procurement system. To do this, they need a strong, widely respected leader.

John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job.

Let's set aside for the moment the questions that have been raised about his drinking habits and his relationships with women. And let's even assume that the most recent FBI investigation into his financial affairs yields no evidence of illegality. There are other, compelling reasons Tower should not be secretary of defense.

It is clear that defense spending will be constrained and that the secretary of defense will have to engage in intricate and delicate negotiations with Congress and within the executive branch. To assure that the resources devoted to defense are adequate, but not excessive, the nation needs a Pentagon leader who is credible.

Tower is not. He has accepted more than three-quarters of a million dollars in payments from U.S. defense contractors for various consulting services he has rendered to them since he retired from the Senate.

In testimony before his former colleagues, he has offered to "recuse" himself—that is, not be involved in—certain decisions involving projects with which he was directly associated. But that is not a feasible solution. It would mean, in effect, that every time such a project required a decision by the secretary of defense, he would have to leave the room. That's no way to run the Pentagon, especially now, when excruciatingly difficult decisions must be made. There is too much at stake to allow vital decisions to be handled by underlings because the secretary of defense's chair is empty.

Unfortunately, Tower's lack of credibility is not limited to issues on which he worked as a consultant, and that is the most significant problem.

Tower is so closely associated with the defense industry that many people will question virtually any statement he makes on defense issues. His supporters argue that Tower knows defense issues and he knows Congress. That is true. But this knowledge is worthless if it is perceived to be tainted by bias.

Why should the people of the United States accept as the leader of their defenses a man whose effectiveness has been impaired by his past? Surely there is one person among the 250 million Americans who is both qualified to be secretary of defense and unfettered by ties to the defense industry?

Tower's nomination shows poor judgment by President Bush. It should be withdrawn. Failing that, it should be rejected.

TOWER APPOINTMENT WOULD SET WORST POSSIBLE EXAMPLE

(By Harry G. Summers, Jr.)

"How can I justify my title of Honest Old Abe with the appointment of a man like Cameron?" lamented President Abraham Lincoln of his secretary of War, Simon Cameron, a Pennsylvania politician who was so splendidly and notoriously corrupt that even Congress took notice and voted him a formal record of censure.

"Honest Old George" Bush may well find himself asking the same question if the Senate Armed Services Committee votes to confirm former Sen. John Tower as secretary of Defense and the full Senate concurs in that nomination. Unlike Simon Cameron, John Tower has yet to be accused of selling diseased horses to the cavalry (perhaps because there's no horse cavalry around anymore), but "Jumpin' John" Tower has been publicly accused of being a drunkard, an adulterer and an influence peddler to the tune of three quarters of a million dollars from various and sundry defense contractors.

Whatever the fire underneath all the smoke that has been raised over the Tower nomination (and some flames—the specifics of the alleged influence peddling, for example—have emerged already) he is a strange candidate for a president who ostensibly "sought out individuals of the highest integrity" to serve in his Cabinet, and who has insisted that he would tolerate "not even a perception of wrongdoing" in his administration. Nowhere are such moral standards more important than for the secretary of Defense.

For one thing, along with the vice president and the secretary of State, the Defense secretary is a statutory member of the National Security Council, which Bush has pledged to revitalize as the nation's power center on matters of war and peace. Here, where the survival of the world may well hang in the balance, a clear head unfogged by alcohol or excess is essential.

For another, the secretary of Defense manages a multibillion-dollar budget already under attack on charges of fraud, mismanagement and corruption. In Tower's case, that aspect of his duties has already been compromised to some degree by the $763,777 he raked in as "consultant" for defense contractors while he was out of office.

Whatever the legality—and Washington's "sleazoid" lawyers can prove anything legal if the fee is right—the ethics of the matter are odious enough to call into question Tower's credibility as an "honest broker" when it comes to matters of Defense Department procurement and acquisition. But that's not the main reason his appointment is so wrong.

The worst aspect of this appointment is the message it would sent to the men and women of our armed forces. It is not generally recognized that, thanks to the ill-conceived restructuring of our defense establishment after World War II, the secretary of Defense is not only the equivalent of the former Cabinet-level secretary of War and secretary of the Navy, he is also the operational commander of the armed forces, in effect the general-in-chief and admiral-in-chief of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps. As with any military commander, the secretary of Defense sets the moral standards for those subordinate leaders under his command.

There is an abominable irony in the fact that the Senate would even consider for the post of "general/admiral-in-chief" an individual who—if guilty of the behavior alleged to Tower—would be rejected outright (in fact, not even considered) were he a serving military officer in the zone for promotion. The truth of the matter is that if Tower were a colonel, he might long ago have been cashiered.

While drunkenness and womanizing are no more unknown in the military than they are in civilian society, in the military they are far less condoned when brought to official attention. Over the years any number of generals, admirals and other senior officers have been quietly called on the carpet for such misbehavior and told to retire or face a military court-martial. Especially in recent years there has been a severe crackdown on alcohol abuse and sexual harassment throughout the services.

To appoint as secretary of Defense one accused on national television of chasing his secretary around the desk and tugging at her skirt, allegedly in a drunken stupor, while serving in Geneva as the arms control representative of the United States, not only makes a mockery of such crackdowns, it sets the worst possible example for the leaders of America's sons and daughters now serving in our armed forces.

As a father and a grandfather, and especially as America's commander in chief, President Bush ought to be ashamed of himself for nominating such an individual in the first place, and so should the members of the United States Senate if they allow this nomination to be confirmed.

[From the Washington Times, Mar. 1, 1989]

TAKING THE PLEDGE, WITH A LIMITED WARRANTY?

(By Harry Summers)

Looking right into the camera on ABC television's "This Week With David Brinkley" last Sunday and keeping a straight face the whole time, former Sen. John Tower took the pledge to abstain from alcohol and backed it up by swearing, "I've never broken a pledge in my life." Sure.

If one of his former wives and those who served with him in Geneva are to be believed, he obviously was not talking about the solemn pledge of fidelity he made during his wedding ceremony. And he could not have meant to include his earlier pledge not to peddle his influence as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee to defense contractors once he was out of office.

This seems to be strictly a limited warranty pledge, and a pathetic one at that. Here was a man aspiring to operational command of America's armed forces throwing his dignity to the winds and swearing to a nationwide audience that he would give up "demon rum" for the duration. Even Carry Nation's credulity would have been strained, for the performance had all the sincerity of a sinner anxious for a handout taking the pledge at a temperance rally. All that was needed was Sam Donaldson laying on hands and a Salvation Army band in the background belting out "Put a Nickel on the Drum, Save Another Drunken Bum . . ."

It was only a month ago that Mr. Tower was pledging that one of his "overarching objectives" was "to restore public confidence in the Department of Defense." Instead, what he has succeeded in doing is undermining public confidence not so much in the Pentagon but in the White House and Capitol Hill.

Mr. Tower has certainly done President Bush no favors. Like Abraham Lincoln, who appointed Pennsylvania politician Simon Cameron as secretary of war to pay off a campaign debt, Mr. Bush understandably nominated Mr. Tower to be secretary of defense. But unlike Mr. Lincoln, who shipped Mr. Cameron off as ambassador to Russia once his true character was revealed, Mr. Bush has stood by his man. White House toadies no doubt have convinced Mr. Bush that he's demonstrating loyalty, in contrast to President Carter, who ran for cover whenever any of his appointees got into trouble.

But what Mr. Bush is really doing is convincing the American people that he doesn't have enough backbone to enforce his own pledge to "seek out individuals of the highest integrity" to serve in his Cabinet. Today those fine words are seen as just so much political hogwash.

By this time common sense should have told Mr. Bush that when it comes to a floor fight to confirm Mr. Tower, even if he wins, he loses; for if Mr. Bush wins he'll be stuck with what many perceive to be a moral degenerate in his Cabinet. No matter how many pledges Mr. Tower makes, one thing he will never be able to do now is "restore public confidence in the Department of Defense."

And by continuing to support Mr. Tower, Mr. Bush has done Senate Republicans no favors, either. By making the nomination a test of party loyalty, Mr. Bush has not only compromised his own integrity, he has forced Republicans in the Senate to compromise their integrity as well. One might suppose it would be liberal Democrats like Ted Kennedy defending Mr. Tower's "swinger's rights," while conservative Republicans like John McCain fought for a restoration of moral standards—but instead the arguments have to be reversed.

When the best argument the Republicans can muster in support of the Tower nomination is that one shouldn't "undermine the presidency," it should be clear to all concerned that Sen. Sam Nunn not only has the votes on his side, he and his fellow Democrats occupy the moral high ground as well.

One reason this point is not as plain as it might be is that some in the media have denied that a moral high ground exists. According to them, morals and character have no place in determining fitness for public office. Citing past presidential peccadilloes as evidence (peccadilloes that some of these "reporters" helped hide from the American people), they deny any connection between private and public behavior. Such attitudes merely confirm the American public's suspicions that the media are so jaded and debauched that they have lost the commonsense ability to tell right from wrong.

But if the issue is properly addressed, telling right from wrong is not difficult. Military officers traditionally use a simple test to judge the fitness and suitability of superior officers, a test that could cut through all the double-talk and hypocrisy that now surrounds the Tower nomination. The question is not "Could I serve in his unit?"—for most believe they could take care of themselves in the worst of circumstances. Instead they would ask the much tougher question, "Would I want my son or daughter to serve under his command?"

If you want to know whether John Tower, pledges and all, should be confirmed, imagine your son or daughter is assigned to the office of the secretary of defense. The answer will be apparent.

JOHN CHANCELLOR NBC NEWS "COMMENTARY" RE: TOWER NOMINATION, MARCH 1, 1989

It's an old and honorable tradition in America that the military doesn't get involved in politics. So we've heard nothing about John Tower from the people who may have to work for him in the Pentagon and the armed forces. But if these men and women can't get into the Tower debate, there is a chain of newspapers that speaks to them and sometimes for them: the Army Times, the Navy Times, the Air Force Times, and Defense News, four influential publications read throughout the military, each with its own editorial policy. All are opposed to the nomination of John Tower.

The editorial in Defense News says that Tower should withdraw because of his work as a consultant to some of the biggest defense contractors, companies that produce, among other things, the B-1 bomber, the B-2 bomber, the MX missile and the proposed Midgetman missile. Senator Tower says that when contracts involving his former employers come up, he may take himself out of the bargaining. Defense News says if he takes himself out, he can't be a full-time Secretary. If he is involved in the bargaining, there will be questions about conflict of interest. Either way, Tower has a problem just when the Pentagon needs a boss who will be popular and persuasive with the Congress and the country.

Publications serving the Defense Department, the Army, Navy and Air Force should know more than most about who should be Secretary of Defense, and when they all come out against John Tower, you've got to pay close attention.

TOWER DOESN'T DESERVE PENTAGON POST, BUSH'S LOYALTY

(By Pat Murphy)

Were he capable of shame, John Tower would be mortified by the burden he's creating for President Bush, for the U.S. military and for the perception of the United States among our friends.

Tower, however, is a man whose ambition clouds his judgment. It was obvious again when he literally groveled on national television with his pledge to practice total alcoholic abstinence. It was apparent he would do anything, promise anything to become secretary of defense.

But confirmation seems in doubt.

And why not?

The former U.S. senator from Texas seems to lose ground each day by contributing to the perception that he's a man of practiced slipperiness and guile.

For example, recall what he said Sunday, in vowing to never allow beverages with spirits to cross his lips.

He did not say he absolutley would forgo drink.

What he said was this:

"I hereby swear and undertake that if confirmed, during the course of my tenure as secretary of defense, I will not consume beverage alcohol of any type or form, including wine, beer or spirits of any kind."

Tower's qualifier—"if confirmed"—was his way of trying to make a deal for the job, while maintaining an out to return to old habits if he is not confirmed.

Pledges of abstinence notwithstanding, can the free world's most powerful military establishment afford to have at its helm a man who admits to drinking himself into drunkenness as recently as a decade ago, and who even at this hour places conditions on his abstinence?

Can the U.S. taxpayer, plagued by defense contractor scandals and cost overruns, afford to have as the military procurement system's chief custodian a man who sold himself as a consultant to defense contractors for fees totaling more than $1 million?

If he becomes defense secretary, would Tower excuse himself from passing judgment on any procurement matters involving industrial clients he served as a consultant, thus turning over some of his principal responsibilities as defense secretary to subordinates?

And what of the service men and women in the field, serving under the command of a defense secretary whose drinking habits have been an issue? Could any force of workers, civilian or military, be expected to function with any pride in the service of a principal executive whose sobriety and judgment is in doubt?

President Bush's loyalty to Tower is rooted in mystery. John Tower does not necessarily tower over all others as an expert in defense matters. The controversy broiling around him, and the causes of the controversy, point to weaknesses of character that raise questions about whether he could bring clarity of thought, uncluttered vision and unquestioned discipline of character required of this important post.

Barely a month into his administration, President Bush finds himself stubbornly defying by example the very excellence he said he would seek in his White House years.

And what would lie ahead were Tower in the Cabinet, and the man in charge of deploying military force to danger zones of the world?

His personal life, his sobriety and his potential conflicts of interests with defense contractors who formerly bought his services would be a focus of continuing public concern and discussion.

President Bush has vowed to go down fighting for Tower's confirmation. That is a sizable statement of confidence in Tower that might well return to haunt the president.

Aides, however, would serve their president and the interests of his administration (which are the shared interests of the country) if they could persuade Tower to withdraw.

It would end an exhausting fight that has brought ruin to the bipartisanship the president insists is important to his goals, and it would clear the way for a defense secretary choice who could instill unquestioned pride and esteem in the huge military establishment that requires excellence in character.

Indeed, simply exhausting the opponents into submission might win President Bush the confirmation battle, but ultimately cost him victory in large engagements.

[From the Arizona Republic, Feb. 26, 1989]

THE TOWER MESS: BUSH HONEYMOON ENDS

Doggedly loyal to the last, George Bush vows to take the fight for John Tower to the floor of the Senate, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 55 to 45. His kinder, gentler relations with Congress, it appears likely, shortly may come to an end.

If this were a partisan split, as might be inferred from the party-line vote on the Armed Services Committee, the president might be excused an obdurate defense of his choice for secretary of defense. But the partisan analysis, so study in appearance, crumbles at the touch.

Sen. John Warner, a Republican known to doubt Mr. Tower's fitness, bowed to White House pressure. The same probably is true of other Republican loyalists, lobbied intensely by the White House. Moreover, the motives of Sens. Sam Nunn and Albert Gore, boll-weevil Democrats committed to bipartisanship, are hardly to be questioned.

Early in the week, after the FBI had filed its report on Mr. Tower, President Bush asserted that the nominee had been exonerated. Others, including a few Republican members of the Senate, saw things differently.

The womanizing charge had not been nailed down with anything like specificity. Even the drinking allegations seemed shopworn, dating from the '70s when Mr. Tower's marriage was fast disintegrating.

But even when the charges of carousing were set aside, a sizable residue of doubt remained. These related mostly to Mr. Tower's close and puzzling relationship with defense contractors, from whom he had derived a high six-figure income for services that, despite close questioning of the nominee, remained obscure.

Sen. Carl M. Levin summarized the nagging doubts about Mr. Tower's scruples, recalling that the nominee had been an arms negotiator in Geneva in 1985 and 1986, at which time he was intimately familiar with the nation's most highly classified weapon systems.

"He left those ongoing talks," Mr. Levin remarked, "and became a consultant to companies involved in producing those same systems, and part of his job description included advice on the probable outcome of those talks. Sen. Tower said he saw no bad appearance in the type of activity he undertook. I do."

So do a good many others. President Bush has laid down the most stringent ethics guidelines for members of his Cabinet, requiring them to avoid both the conflict of interests and the appearance of impropriety. Several Cabinet members—Labor Secretary Dole, Secretary of State Baker, Treasury Secretary Brady—have had to sell stock or establish blind trusts. Yet the Senate was asked to close its eyes to Mr. Tower's quick shift from arms negotiator to arms consultant.

No one can question Mr. Tower's indefatigable efforts on behalf of the Bush-Quayle ticket in Texas and elsewhere. Such services deserve to be rewarded. But the cold, stark reality is that, as the nominee for secretary of defense, John Tower is a serious liability whose likelihood of being confirmed grows increasingly remote.

He should withdraw his name from consideration; and if he will not withdraw, he should be dumped.

HIGH FRONTIER,
Arlington, VA, February 20, 1989.

Senator DENNIS DECONCINI,
The U.S. Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: Please take a moment to read this brief letter to the editors of The New York Times on the matter of the Tower confirmation.

Sincerely,

DANIEL O. GRAHAM,
Lieutenant General, USA (Ret.)

HIGH FRONTIER,
Arlington, VA, February 20, 1989.

DEAR SIR: Your story on the John Tower confirmation issue (18 Feb. 1989) left the impression that while I am concerned with Tower's lukewarm position on SDI, I have no problem with his personal reputation. That is not the case.

I am very much concerned with Mr. Tower's reputation for drinking and womanizing. No officer in any of the military services would expect to be promoted if he had such a reputation. Any ranking officer that acquired such a reputation could expect to be asked to resign.

Senators should consult some retired military leaders on this matter before they vote on Mr. Tower's confirmation. Every retired officer with whom I have discussed this matter agrees with me that Tower's confirmation as Secretary of Defense would be a serious detriment to the morale of the officer corps of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines.

This is not to say that all military leaders are sober and chaste. Far from it. But the officer corps has yet to lower its standards to the point where Mr. Tower's reputation would be tolerated.

President Bush has certainly proven his loyalty to a political ally—it is time that ally proved his loyalty to Mr. Bush by withdrawing. Mr. Tower should realize that the sensationalist sector of the press will never let the issue of his personal reputation die, a fact that will severely damage his effectiveness as Secretary of Defense.

Sincerely,

DANIEL O. GRAHAM,
Lieutenant General, USA (Ret.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, since the Senator from Arizona is still on the floor, I want to ask if he would permit me to ask him a question about his comment. I did not have time to go out to the stenographers' room to check the record.

Am I correct in saying that the Senator from Arizona stated, among his other remarks, that there was "evidence of wrongdoing on the part of Senator Tower in the report?"

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator repeat the question?

Mr. RUDMAN. The statement I believe the Senator made was "there is evidence of wrongdoing in the files."

Mr. DECONCINI. I said, I think—and I have to look at the record—in my judgment there is evidence of wrongdoing. If that is not correct in the RECORD, I ask that it be corrected. In my judgment there is evidence of wrongdoing.

Mr. RUDMAN. I submit to the Senator, and I would like him to respond, that there was absolutely not a single bit of evidence of wrongdoing in the legal sense in that report or anywhere else, wrongdoing in the way we Americans use the term.

Mr. DECONCINI. I say to the Senator, I am an American, too, and the way I use the term Senator Tower not only made a mistake, he did some wrong things. That is why we are here debating that. Not because of appearance. I think he did make a mistake and did some wrong things. Are they criminal? No, I have never said they were criminal. To me they are wrong. If the Senator does not think they are wrong, he is entitled to his opinion. This Senator certainly is entitled to his opinion of what is wrong. It is wrong. My conscience is very clear.

Mr. RUDMAN. I would say to the Senator from Arizona that if he says a person used poor personal judgment, was guilty of a moral lapse, used less than impeccable standards in his personal life, that is one thing—But to say that there is evidence of wrongdoing is something else entirely. I think the Senator really ought to state that he does not mean that there is evidence of wrongdoing anywhere in a legal or civil sense. There may be evidence, rebutted or unrebutted, of poor judgment but not of wrongdoing.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield, in my judgment it is wrong. OK?

Mr. RUDMAN. Fine.

Mr. DECONCINI. Now, the Senator from New Hampshire may feel it is not wrong in those citations and those allegations, that they are merely bad judgments; they are merely misjudgments; they are nothing more than a difference of opinion as to a weight of what is right and what is wrong. In my judgment, I know what is wrong and when I had to come down on the report they are wrong. They are wrongdoings in my judgment. I have never said they are criminal wrongdoings, and if they are that it is not for me to decide or to pass judgment on, quite frankly.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the Senator for his candid answer, and I think in his answer we find much of the problem that is confusing us in this debate. I will begin by simply saying that I agree with the Senator from Arizona, that as the months go by the wounds of this battle will undoubtedly heal and we will be friends and will continue to do the peoples' business. I likewise have no doubt that there is a watershed being established in the Senate at this time which I never thought would be aired in a Chamber as august as this. We are reaching a very thin line on confusing private morality with public ethics. When we start examining private morality in terms of public ethics, I dare say that those of us in public life had better start wearing very heavily armored vests.

Mr. President, I intend today—and I do not wish to take a lot of time—to talk about the record that we have before us; that is, the record now on the desk of every Member of the Senate entitled, "A Report of the Majority of the Senate Armed Services Committee."

Before I do that, I want to say that I am not one who shares the view of some in this Chamber that anyone started out in this endeavor to "get" John Tower. I do not believe for a moment the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, my friend, SAM NUNN, decided that the committee would find a way to bury John Tower. As a matter of fact, I can tell you in all candor that in discussions, private discussions with friends on the other side of the aisle over the last 48 hours, it is becoming very obvious to me that there is a high discomfort level with many who have already publicly stated how they will vote. And that, Mr. President, is because it seems very clear that what happened is that this entire matter truly got out of control. It got out of control, in my view, because of the number of repetitive, sometimes vicious, public reports, be they leaks by members of the committee or leaks by people outside of the Senate, to the press. These stories were trumpeted across the country, so that by the time the nominee testified at his confirmation hearing, his character already was besmirched. In America you cannot endure that kind of a media assault and come out in one piece. In my view, it is impossible to repair that kind of damage, and that was the setting, the backdrop against which this committee had the tough assignment of conducting hearings.

As far as I am concerned, it got totally out of control. Every major allegation we heard prior to the hearing was literally blown out of the water—ludicrous stories, such as dancing with ballerinas in Houston, or visiting Bergstrom Air Force Base in a drunken state. The overwhelming evidence—now is that the person who made the accusations was not even there. Statements were made by a businessman from Arizona against the nominee when it turns out that the nominee was not even at the place cited in the allegation. And now we come to the point where we have to cast a public vote based on a public record which in my view says that the candidate is qualified but on which his nomination is in great jeopardy because of an FBI report.

I think it is important for the people of this country to understand that that is not an FBI report. It is a compilation of testimony—unsworn, unconfirmed, uncorroborated. It is raw intelligence. In many cases the witnesses are anonymous; in others they are clearly mentally deranged or, from my reading of the evidence, personally vindictive. They were not subject to any kind of cross-examination. Nor in the great majority of cases were polygraphs used. And yet it is on that kind of uncorroborated, unsworn, unchallenged, uncross-examined junk in most cases that John Tower will probably see his nomination go down to defeat.

I do not think anyone intended it to be this way—not SAM NUNN, not JOHN WARNER, not our new majority leader, GEORGE MITCHELL, not BOB DOLE. Nobody intended for it to get out of hand, but we are now in this box. The problem with the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona is that to simply release the FBI report with names sanitized amplifies the irresponsibility of that document.

The only way in a perfect world to assess the weight of that evidence is to subject each of the affiants to that evidence to cross-examination and rebuttal by others who were there at the same time who saw things differently. That is the only way. I doubt if we are going to do that. Maybe we should.

Someone in the press said to me yesterday, "Why are you all keeping up this fight? It is hurting the President." I am not sure it is or is not, but that is what some people are writing—"The Senate cannot do its other important business."

I am going to tell you why I am standing. Because with all due respect to the President, to this institution, and to this country, the single element that makes America different from any other place in the world is that we believe in due process and the rights of the individual.

How many times do we hear of our State Department traveling around the world fighting for human rights? What about John Tower's human rights? In all of my years in public service—and I was attorney general of my State—I tried scores, indeed, hundreds of cases. Yet I have never seen anyone trashed on such flimsy evidence in my entire life: One witness, who publicly applied his personal moral standards to John Tower's ethics. One.

Up to now, we have not been able to take those FBI reports out of there, but I have read them very carefully. I have read a lot of FBI reports in my life as well as a lot of other reports. I have committed a lot of it to memory. The rules say that you cannot divulge what is in the report. I will not do that. But I can say what is not in the report. I challenge anyone here today on either side of the aisle to rebut what I am going to say about what is not in that report.

I want to deal with three issues: First, the so-called conflict-of-interest issue; second, the drinking issue; third, the womanizing issue, whatever that word means. I am not sure.

John Tower has complied with every statute in the United States Code and every ethics rule relating to the executive or legislative branch to a "T."

Senator NUNN, in his statement the night of the vote, said, "This is not a classic conflict of interest issue that can be resolved by reference to the rules governing divestiture and recusal." That is a pretty flatout statement. He then says: "It reflects a fundamental policy judgment as to whether an individual can command public confidence, which is required, if he is to lead the efforts to devise and implement significant reforms in the Department of Defense."

Whatever happened to due process? I was taught in civics class, as well as in law school, that laws and ethics codes are rules to control one's actions in society. If you conform with the rules, then you are living within the purview of societal approval. But John Tower has a different standard.

Let us look at the report. The majority report notes on page 14:

> The State Department has issued guidance governing postemployment activities which cautions against disclosure of inside information, as well as classified and administratively controlled information. Former employees are advised to take care not to communicate any confidential information of subsequent reports.

I thought of that hook in the report, and I thought to myself: "The fellow who wrote that is really clever, because there is not one iota of evidence that any such thing occurred." In fact, there is no evidence to the contrary.

The only evidence is John Tower's statement that he never divulged any classified information of any kind to any client.

Then the committee, in this very artful report which, with all due respect to all in the Chamber, is worthy of the kind of indictment one would find in a people's court in the Soviet Union goes on to say: "The committee has no evidence that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information. In the committee's judgment, however, this situation created the appearance of using public office for private gain and casts doubt on his ability to command public confidence in the integrity of the system."

Well, I will say something to my colleagues. I was chairman of the Senate Ethics Committee for 2 years, and am now vice chairman. My great friend from Alabama, Senator HEFLIN, and I have a number of cases pending. I would like to see the treatment accorded Senator HEFLIN and myself if the following were to happen: We would come to the floor with a recommendation of censure of Senator X, and Senator HEFLIN or I would stand up and say, "Now, Senator X complied with the ethics code to the letter." That is what this report says. "He obeyed the law. There is no violation of our rules. However, it is our view that the appearance of this transaction, although within the code, is so outrageous that we wish you to censure him or her anyway." I will tell you what would happen. Senator HEFLIN and Senator RUDMAN would be off the Ethics Committee by sundown.

You cannot have a shifting standard of conduct. What did we really expect Senator Tower to do after he gave up an additional 14 months of his life? He spent all that time on the Tower Commission, and he left. Was he to write poetry, like my colleague from Maine? Run a dairy farm? Maybe he could run the carryout in the Dirksen basement. Of course, Senator Tower did something related to defense. That is where he spent his life.

This report says he did not violate one law, one rule, one code. But Senators say, "Oh, well, we are talmudic scholars. We are going to apply our own standard." So beware, nominees: If you ever served in the Government, do not just look at the ethics codes and the statutes. Get into the heads of everybody on the committee and everybody in the Senate, because it is their personal judgment that will determine whether you rise or fall.

If that is fairness, I do not understand the word. So much for the defense industry.

Let us move on to his drinking problem. First, let us correct the record. I believe I am correct in saying that Senator Tower has never said he had a drinking problem. He never said that. He said that in the period of the 1970's, he was a heavy social drinker, and he probably was. In the period of the 1960's and 1970's, a lot of people were. Social conduct and social mores have changed. But the accusation is fascinating. Let me just read the accusation: "The committee determined that Senator Tower's excessive use of alcohol would disqualify him from being assigned to many sensitive positions in the Department of Defense."

Well, that is interesting. Now, let us look at how they define the standard, because, at least in my view, you cannot apply a standard unless you know what you apply it to. How do you define it? Let me read that:

> Alcohol abuse is defined in the DOD directive as "any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships."

That is the standard.

Senator HEFLIN sat on the Supreme Court of Alabama. He is a wise man and a very good judge. I listened to him yesterday. He said something that makes incredibly good sense. We all know people who have had drinking problems. They are generally called alcoholics. Lucky, indeed, is the family in America today that does not have a member who has not had a problem of that kind.

It is pervasive.

We have people we work with who have had problems that were in fact alcoholic in nature.

I want someone to tell me in good conscience that they have known a person who is an alcoholic and who, over a 24-year period, not as a milkman, not as a factory worker, but as a U.S. Senator and arms negotiator, a representative of the President of the United States, was not once found to have had anything happen in the public eye. Not an accident, not a public embarrassment, no plunging into the Tidal Basin or other such asinine antisocial conduct. Nothing.

I dare say that what you see is what you get. When someone is in public life for 24 years with that kind of a record, it is pretty hard for anyone in this body to say he is unfit because of alcohol.

Senator Tower said he drank heavily in the 1970's. That is what the RECORD indicates.

Again, I will tell you what is not in the report. Let anyone challenge it. There is not one iota, not one scintilla, not one grain of evidence in that report of any kind of misconduct or impairment while Senator Tower was officially engaged in his duties. As a matter of fact, there is not very much of that type of conduct in his private life. There are several instances which are captioned, instances which I dare say have probably not been unusual in the lives of many who passed the age of 60.

I think it is a pretty bum rap to tell the American people that George Bush, the newly elected President of the United States, is about to nominate or did nominate a man as a Secretary of Defense who has an alcohol problem.

Does anyone seriously believe that George Bush would not have known that? Does anybody believe that the President of the United States would nominate a man to this position who has a problem? No.

What we have here is a group of people reading reports who do not know what they are reading.

I can tell you unequivocally that that report indicates no evidence of what we classically call alcoholism or an alcohol problem. It indicates a man that was probably a heavier-than-normal social drinker in the 1970's and who, since the early 1980's, has not engaged in such drinking. Moreover, he has given a pledge which to me is worth something. No one that I know ever challenged John Tower's honor, no one. His word was good on this floor.

Finally, womanizing. It is almost impossible to make sense of this particular allegation. You would assume that the committee would lead with its best evidence. So let me read you the official document which will be memorialized forever as a report of the committee on the Tower nomination. Listen to this because this is incredible. I mean, if I were trying to do a number on somebody and one of my staff wrote this, I would fire him. I mean, it is inept. I assume it is inept because it is the best they had. Listen to it:

> The Committee examined a number of allegations concerning the nominee's behavior toward women. The Committee's record on this issue demonstrates no finding of liaisons with female foreign nationals and, hence, no security violations that such activities would entail.

None.

> Nor does the record support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex.

Well, there are the two charges, fraternizing with foreign agents who were female and bringing pressure to bear in a sexual way on employees. There are the two charges. The majority says they're not true. But would you like to see a little character assassination at work, the old knife slipped between the ribs. Catch this one:

> There are, however, a number of examples of personal conduct which the Committee found indiscreet and which called into question Senator Tower's judgment. These examples add to the cumulative body of concern the Committee has about this nomination.

If this were a courtoom, they would throw the paper, the lawyer, and the witnesses out of court.

That is absurd. First, you make a finding that there were no liaisons with foreign agents, or pressure on female employees, and then you talk about indiscretions. They could not have been too indiscreet because we do not know what they are. Nobody read about them in the Washington Post. There was never a public incident regarding this sort of thing.

There are allegations, to be sure, in that report. They are also rebutted, I might add, in three cases—I think there were only three cases of that type. In these three people give contrary testimony, including one of the women who is alleged to have been victimized and who said it was absolutely false.

That, my friends, is the case against John Tower, a case built on standards of conduct in the conflict of interest area that are not only new, they are nonexistent. They are standards that each Senator wants to put in his own mind. I guess we have the right to do that. We have the right to do almost anything. We do not have to tell people why we vote the way we vote. We can just vote.

But it seems to me that basic fairness and due process would say to someone that if we have a body of law and you obey that body of law, then we are not going to hang a new one around you when you are nominated for a new job.

That is what the committee has done, individually, shifting standards. You do not like the way it looks, do not like the inference, do not like the appearance, obey the law. But everybody has his own standard.

It is a great way to be judged by 99 separate moralities, mixing up again private morality with public ethics.

I will say nothing else about drinking, the record is clear. John Tower is not an alcoholic. He has no drinking problem.

It is a shame this man gets pilloried this way after the kind of service he rendered this country. It is a shame that this is what it comes to, particularly in this body where I would think we would have been more careful of the treatment of people and their reputations.

I'll tell you what I think. This will not happen. The Republican leader is on the floor. I know the Presidency is important, but I think George Bush will do just fine. The Government is going to move ahead. We are going to get a budget. We will do all sorts of things.

I would like to see this thing recommitted. That is what I would like. I would like these anonymous witnesses to come forward.

The basic history of American jurisprudence in the smallest criminal case is that you have the right to confront your accuser, not just read what he said, but confront him or her and bring other witnesses in. Then let the finder of fact find the facts, not through anonymous characterization. Oh, yes, it will take time. It will tie us up for some more time. It will take more out of this body, I am sure, but I will make an observation to you. There is nothing more important that we do here than worry about the individual rights of one person. By our procedures, we have put John Tower in this position. He has a right to be heard or he has a right to be confirmed, one or the other.

Back in 1976, Mr. President, I was nominated by Gerald Ford, to be Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I could not get a hearing. As an attorney general of New Hampshire with a record of absolute integrity from that day to this, I was simply told by committee staff—I could not even get to see the Senators, except for a couple—that there was something in a file that was pretty damaging. I said, "Let me see it."

"Oh, no, we can't let you see it."

Five months later I withdrew. I never took the position, never had a hearing.

The second day I was here I went to BOB PACKWOOD, then chairman of the Commerce Committee. I said, "Senator PACKWOOD, I want to see the report on my nomination."

He said, "I would be glad to."

He sent it down to me. I opened it up. The report from the witness, the incident that they were investigating, came out of the mouth of a certified con man, a convicted felon, a liar extraordinaire. Three years after the event, that individual was convicted and put in Federal prison for another game that he was playing. Why he was playing this game, nobody ever knew.

That is the kind of thing this Senate can do accidentally. I do not think anybody did it intentionally. But nobody bothered or had the good sense to follow up to find out who this guy was. It is a long story and I will not bore the Senate with it. But I am sensitive to the way nominees are treated around here after that experience and this nominee has not been treated fairly.

Senator HOLLINGS gave a speech the other day in which he had some strong feelings. He is entitled to them. But knowing him as I do, I know he would not object to letting those people who made the statements come up and be examined, let them be cross-examined. And maybe I will believe them, but maybe I will not. We want human rights in the world. Let us have human rights in the U.S. Senate for John Tower.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. GORTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORTON. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of my distinguished friend from New Hampshire. As I remember them, he covered three of the reasons which have been given, publicly and on this floor, to justify a rejection of John Tower as Secretary of Defense. He went through, first, accusations of some kind of conflict of interest. I must say I believe the Senator from New Hampshire more than successfully demolished those charges because not even the committee majority can assert that any law, regulation or ethical rule of this Senate was violated by any of the actions of John Tower.

But, as I think the Senator from New Hampshire knows, only a relatively small number of Senators who oppose this nomination have based their opposition on that ground.

The Senator from New Hampshire went briefly into accusations of womanizing, but to the best of my knowledge, no single Senator who has opposed this nomination publicly has used that ground as a reason for opposition.

The Senator from New Hampshire went through the various allegations about drinking behavior which again have clearly moved at least some Members who have opposed this nomination, but I believe fewer than half of them.

I wonder if the Senator from New Hampshire would complete his remarks by commenting on what has seemed to me to be perhaps the least justifiable of all of the reasons advanced for rejecting John Tower as nominee for Secretary of Defense. And that was one which was brought up by I believe more than half of the members of the Armed Services Committee at the time at which we voted on this nomination. One after another, members would say:

> The case against John Tower with respect to alcoholism or alcohol abuse has not been proven. The case with respect to womanizing has not been proven. It is clear that no conflict of interest laws or rules were violated. But the collection of these allegations is so thick that it gives a perception that there was some wrongdoing at some level of another. And because of leaks which have gotten out from the FBI report into the newspapers and on the television, there is a perception on the part of many of the American people that something is wrong and therefore we must reject John Tower's nomination as Secretary of Defense.

I wonder if my good friend and distinguished colleague who has shared not only a Senate experience with this Senator but experience as an attorney general would comment on the fairness or the appropriateness of rejecting this nomination on the basis of perceptions which are not even asserted by those who use that as a reason to be true.

Mr. RUDMAN. Well, I will answer it this way to my good friend from Washington. We served together as attorneys general of our States for close to 7 years.

The thing about this that bothers me more than anything else is what I referred to at the very beginning of my remarks; namely, that this matter is out of control. Nobody really wanted to end up here.

I believe that what has happened here is the cumulative effect of a great many accusations, the majority of which, by Senator EXON's own standards, as he noted on television this weekend, was garbage. The remainder—he did not characterize but I would characterize it as in some doubt. Somehow we have taken the full 100 percent, and the public perception is if there is that much smoke about somebody there must be something wrong.

That would be the most unjust way to judge a human being. I suppose on that basis that I might be able to stand here with the immunity of this floor and make a series of totally false accusations about someone with great fervor. And I suppose that after making enough of them people would start to think that some of them might be true.

The only thing that I can figure out is that as this snowball started to go down the hill and build up speed and momentum, it built up a life of its own. Essentially, a great many stories which were absolutely false were nonetheless made believable by those who may have had a shred of truth to them.

I am not sure that says there is nothing in that report that indicates bad judgment on occasion by John Tower. But I suppose it is bad judgment that many used back in the sixties and seventies, because many people during that period, including, I am sure, some in this body, used alcohol more than was probably good for their health.

But the fact is there was nothing in John Tower's official conduct that will reflect that. And that is the problem I have.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. COHEN. First, I want to commend the Senator from New Hampshire for an extraordinary statement. I think that he has addressed key issues involved in this matter in one of the most powerful and persuasive ways that I have witnessed in the history of this Chamber.

I was particularly interested in what he had to say about the FBI report. We have heard that word used over and over and over again. I want to thank the Senator from New Hampshire for clarifying that we are not talking about an FBI report, but about FBI files, raw information, data collected by the FBI which is not subjected to cross-examination or to any other major test of credibility, except on occasion.

I was wondering if the Senator from New Hampshire had an opportunity to read the piece that appears in the Wall Street Journal today, written by Karen Elliott House.

Mr. RUDMAN. I have.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 7, 1989]

REALLY, FBI: I HAVE NO DIRT ON TOWER

I was a source for the Federal Bureau of Investigation's probe of Sen. John Tower. And, if my experience is in any way typical of the 500 or more interviews conducted by FBI agents in compiling the secret dossier on Sen. Tower's career and character, the U.S. Senate is pursuing its debate on the basis of rumor, gossip and innuendo that any American citizen clearly would consider character assassination. This secret FBI report, of course, is the eye of the hurricane engulfing Sen. Tower's nomination to be secretary of defense in the Bush administration.

Since not one of 100 senators, many of whom have served, worked and traveled with John Tower for decades, has testified to any firsthand knowledge of his alleged drinking and skirt-chasing, it is the FBI report that is being wielded as the murder weapon to destroy not only his nomination but his name. Thus, it seems instructive to senators and citizens to recount one FBI interview, how it originated, what it produced and most important, how easy it would have been to pile additional innuendo on the bonfire around which the Senate is gleefully dancing.

A 17-YEAR-OLD RUMOR

My interview began with a call one afternoon a few weeks ago from a polite FBI agent, requesting a meeting. I guessed the topic was John Tower. Two days earlier I had received a call from the Los Angeles Times correspondent in Houston requesting a copy of a newspaper article that he had been told contained an account of John Tower propositioning me 17 years ago when I was a young Washington correspondent for The Dallas Morning News. I had indeed written a lengthy profile of Sen. Tower during his re-election campaign in 1972 in which I queried him on rumors of his frequent appearances with women other than his wife and on several auto accidents in which he was involved. It might have been a better story if Sen. Tower had propositioned me, but he didn't.

The only offer I ever had from Sen. Tower was a polite and public invitation to me and by inference a table of Dallas Morning News colleagues to join him for "jazz and scrambled eggs" after a White House correspondents' dinner 17 years ago—an invitation I declined and which seems as innocuous in retrospect as it did at the time. But the rumor mill was obviously grinding away.

Within hours of the FBI phone call, two polite but persistent young agents, one male, one female, showed up at my New York office for what turned out to be a half-hour interview. They quickly explained they had received an anonymous letter saying that if they wanted "derogatory information on John Tower," to contact me or my then-roommate, Sally Shelton, at the time a legislative assistant to Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D., Texas).

Having passed on the anonymous charge, the FBI agents then graciously offered me anonymity to confirm and expand on it or on any other information I might have about misconduct by Sen. Tower. I declined the offer of anonymity. I also explained that not only did I have no firsthand experience with any misconduct by Sen. Tower, in my reporting efforts 17 years ago to track down similar rumors, I'd been unable to substantiate gossip about Sen. Tower's "womanizing."

So, we now had the odd situation of a reporter who had been unable to confirm rumors about John Tower and other women at that time now being asked by the FBI to anonymously confirm rumors about John Tower propositioning her. With this trail clearly leading nowhere, the agents politely pressed for any other information I might have—or any rumors I might have heard. All I could do was acknowledge that rumors of Sen. Tower's interest in women have abounded in Washington for many years. I suggested that Ms. Shelton, who had worked on Capitol Hill for five years, might be in a better position to speak factually.

The FBI, indeed, did contact Ms. Shelton. In her case, she says, the agents focused their questions on rumors of "sexual harassment" by Sen. Tower of another of her roommates who worked in the Senate. Ms. Shelton, now a retired ambassador, says she was startled to be queried about events so distant and distorted. She says she explained to the FBI that she had heard rumors of the senator's "womanizing," but nothing about Sen. Tower sexually harassing women staffers on Capitol Hill.

Ms. Shelton is as perplexed as I am by the rumor process that has led us to be even peripherally involved in the Tower investigation. The experience also leads to some other reflections. For one thing, a process of rumors begetting rumors offers anyone with the slightest shred of gossip to pass it on through official channels, to instigate additional FBI inquiries and to widen further the web of innuendo in which the senator is snared. Had either Ms. Shelton or I sought to play a mischievous role in the nomination process, we had ample opportunity—indeed an FBI invitation—to do so.

Nothing in this process safeguards the subject of the inquiry from distortions and outright lies except the possibility that such lies might be leaked to the press, causing the accuser's word to be put on record. The irony, of course, is that it would be only the unethical leaking of lies that could expose lies. If the system works in its intended furtive fashion, the word of the liar is protected and the character of the subject may be destroyed.

SAFEGUARDS OF JOURNALISM

Journalism also relies to some extent on confidential interviews and anonymous information. But there are critical differences. Good journalism encourages people to speak on the record and offers confidentiality only as a last resort. Good journalism requires double- and triple-sourcing for publication of any controversial information. Good journalism requires that the target of criticism be presented with the specific charges and that a response be included in the original article. Finally, and most important, the article lands in the public domain where the reporter's reputation is on the line for the veracity of sources. None of these protections are available to Sen. Tower in the FBI's investigatory process.

Beyond all this is the substantive issue of what possible difference it can make to the Senate or the American citizenry whether Sen. Tower did or did not pursue or proposition a woman 17 years ago—or for that matter 17 weeks ago. There may indeed be substantive issues at stake in this nomination and those might include current or recent alcohol abuse or illegal conflict of interest as a consultant to defense corporations.

But so far there is no evidence of any laws or rules being broken during Mr. Tower's period as a defense consultant. As for alcohol abuse, the conclusive proof that he isn't an alcoholic would seem to rest with his fellow senators themselves—none of whom has stood up to say that in decades of working with Mr. Tower in all sorts of places at all kinds of hours, he has ever seen the former senator drunk. It begs credulity that any alcoholic could hide his addiction for that long from that many colleagues. Perhaps it is for this reason that so much of the current debate is focusing on the alleged character flaw of a weakness for women.

And, to the extent that my involvement in the womanizing issue is one small strand in the pattern under debate, the tapestry of John Tower being woven for and by the Senate is a tapestry of rumor, gossip and innuendo.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, here is a story of a very prominent journalist who was the subject of a rumor, a 17-year-old rumor based upon the fact that John Tower, 17 years ago, at the end of a White House dinner, invited her and the other members of her table to jazz and eggs following the meeting. And, on the basis of that rumor that persisted over 17 years, she was interviewed by the FBI.

They came to her and they said they had an anonymous source that indicated that she might have some derogatory information to pass on about John Tower and that she could remain anonymous herself. She declined.

In today's Wall Street Journal, she writes:

Having passed on the anonymous charge, the FBI agents then graciously offered me anonymity to confirm and expand on it or on any other information I might have about misconduct by Sen. Tower.

She went on to conclude:

The experience also leads to some other reflections. For one thing, a process of rumors begetting rumors offers anyone with the slightest shred of gossip to pass it on through official channels, to instigate additional FBI inquiries and to widen further the web of innuendo in which the senator is snared.

She says:

Had either Ms. Shelton or I sought to play a mischievous role in the nomination process, we had ample opportunity—indeed an FBI invitation—to do so.

And she concludes this particular piece by saying:

And, to the extent that my involvement in the womanizing issue is one small strand in the pattern under debate, the tapestry of John Tower being woven for and by the Senate is a tapestry of rumor, gossip and innuendo.

Here is an example of a respected journalist, a 17-year-old rumor, an innocent statement then being used as basis for investigation, interrogation, and offers she remain anonymous if she chose to do so, only to further this web of great accusation.

I think it is a great example of the kind of process that is involved in an FBI investigation.

Mr. RUDMAN. Let me just conclude by stating that the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Maine hit on very key points. The Senator from Arizona mentioned a while ago that he would like to have the FBI report sanitized and made public. I do not have a problem with that except I know that the chairman of the Armed Services Committee himself, in conversations we have had, has agonized over the fact that we are dealing with anonymous sources and uncorroborated testimony. That is not his fault. That is the system, and that is the way it came here.

But this is so extraordinary. It just seems to me that to vote this man down based on evidence that well could be furnished by people who are lying, who are fabricating, who are uncorroborated, and uncross-examined, sets a very troubling precedent.

I do not know what the solution is. I see my good friend from South Carolina is on the floor. I have worked with Senator HOLLINGS for a long, long time. I would have great confidence if Senator HOLLINGS and the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from the State of Washington, just three Senators I know have a lot of legal experience, could sit down with some of these witnesses and examine them even without John Tower present. I think we would find out whether they were reliable or not.

I am talking about reliability, about basic decency to a human being so that he can at least have his accusers called to account for themselves.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair for this courtesy, and I yield the floor.

UNITED NATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas R. Pickering, of New Jersey, to be the Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations with the rank and status of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, and the Representative of the United States of America in the Security Council of the United Nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate on the nomination is limited to 20 minutes to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Rhode Island. Senator PELL, and the Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, or their designees.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island, Senator PELL.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am very pleased to support the nomination of Thomas R. Pickering to be the next American Ambassador to the United Nations. The Foreign Relations Committee unanimously approved his nomination on February 28.

Ambassador Pickering has served in the Foreign Service with great distinction. He is one of only five Foreign Service Officers to currently hold the rank of Career Ambassador and only 32 others have been so honored since the rank was established in the mid-1950's. I believe it is a sign of the high esteem in which he is held that President Bush nominated him to be our Ambassador at the United Nations—a post that has usually been reserved for a political appointee.

Ambassador Pickering is fortunate to have been nominated for this post at a time when public faith in the United Nations is being restored. Over the last year—in Afghanistan, the Persian Gulf, and southern Africa—the United Nations has demonstrated that it has a valuable role to play in helping to bring stability and peace to the troubled regions of the world.

These successes, together with an improvement in the management practices at the United Nations, even moved the Reagan administration to drop its harsh anti-U.N. rhetoric and request full funding for the United Nations and its affiliated agencies. The Reagan budget also requests funds to begin to repay the large arrearages we have accumulated over the past 8 years. I was very pleased to learn from Ambassador Pickering that the Bush administration has adopted these funding requests as its own.

I believe the time has come for the United States to regain lost ground in the United Nations. President Gorbachev's new activism in the United Nations marks an important shift in the Soviet approach to international organizations. The United States cannot afford to stand idly by. We must use our influence to lead the United Nations to new triumphs, rather than take it to the brink of bankruptcy. I believe Ambassador Pickering is the right man for the job.

My only regret is that Ambassador Pickering has not been accorded Cabinet status as was his predecessor.

One final note. Ambassador Pickering's nomination to the United Nations—a spot usually reserved for political appointees—generated high hopes throughout the State Department that the Bush administration would harness the experience and talent of our professional Foreign Service. Since then there have been growing signs that the Foreign Service is being locked out of the policymaking process. I hope this development can be attributed to the disorganization that accompanies Presidential transitions, rather than any deliberate design. As the career of Ambassador Pickering has demonstrated, the professional Foreign Service can provide invaluable advice and support to any administration.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, during the nomination hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, and prior to that, this Senator had personal conversations with Mr. Pickering. He knows that I wish him well, for he is wading into a real quagmire when he goes to the United Nations.

If Mr. Pickering can improve any of the aspects of anti-Americanism and pro-Communist bias within the United Nations, he would have performed his job well.

Mr. President, the challenges faced by the United States at the United Nations are obviously significant. Indeed, the United States remains under almost constant assault in that body. At the same time, the United Nations itself faces challenges of its own to establish itself as a relevant forum for addressing international issues.

For far too long the United Nations has relegated itself to serving as little more than a platform for disgruntled Third World and Communist-bloc nations that have used every possible opportunity to criticize the United States, our allies, the free enterprise system, and democracy. Indeed, last year the U.N. General Assembly sided with the United States positions only 16.6 percent of the time and sided with the Soviet Union an overwhelming 95.9 percent of the time.

The United Nations has displayed itself sympathy for terrorist organizations through its funding and support, through the PLO, SWAPO, and ANC. It has defended the indefensible, the regime of Qadhafi and continues even this past week with its crusade against Israel, one of our most consistent allies.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to summarize my statement and I ask unanimous consent first that the full statement be printed in the RECORD and second that it be placed just after the remarks by the distinguished chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, the United Nations spends an extraordinary amount of time on the Arab-Israeli conflict. The so-called debate on this issue within the U.N. tends to be largely an exercise in trashing Israel. As a recent American Ambassador to Israel, Mr. Pickering has an opportunity to present the facts with respect to this conflict and to do so with unique credibility. For an example, many in the major news media in our own country have done all they can to legitimize Yasser Arafat and the PLO. The media has presented the uprisings in Israel as spontaneous eruptions of frustration. However, as Tom Pickering knows and as all Senators should know, these demonstrations are often orchestrated events with participation forced upon many rioters. And as part of America Ambassador Pickering's confirmation process I submitted the following written question:

> I have read a number of reports which indicate that the PLO has used intimidation tactics to force residents of the so-called West Bank to participate in strikes and riots. In fact since the start of the uprising, at least 66 moderate West Bank Arabs have been murdered by radical Palestinians. Has the PLO used intimidation tactics or is participation in strikes and riots entirely voluntary?

To this question, the Ambassador responded:

> I believe the PLO has used intimidation tactics to encourage some individuals to participate in strikes and riots in the West Bank and Gaza.

During discussions at the United Nations on the situation in Israel, I hope Ambassador Pickering will make it very clear that the uprising is not so spontaneous as is being portrayed by the major media or by the Third Worlders and Communists who dominate the United Nations.

The latest examples of U.N. basis can be seen in southern Africa. We have a situation in which the U.N.-appointed general in charge of monitoring the Cuban troop wtihdrawal from Angola reveals his blatant bias in favor of the Communist Angolans and Cubans by stating, "We will trust the information given by both countries [that is, Cuba and Angola]", he said. "There is no reason to mistrust them", he said. He is apparently not very well versed in history.

So the United Nations plans to send less than 100 people to verify the Cuban troop withdrawal—with a bias of trust for Communists by the lead general in charge. Meanwhile in Namibia, the United Nations plans to send thousands of civilian and military personnel to oversee elections in that country and the withdrawal of South African troops. The imbalance—less than 100 versus thousands—is evident.

In perhaps one of the greatest examples of irony, the United Nations plans to send soldiers from Communist and other one-party totalitarian countries to monitor the elections in Namibia and the initiation of democracy in that country. Yet these folks have never had an election in their own countries, but they are supposed to be in charge of overseeing one in Namibia. It would be laughable were it not so serious.

Mr. President, Ambassador Pickering clarified a number of points about the Angola/Namibia agreements, and the United Nations role in their implementation, in the course of his confirmation hearing on February 23. Additionally, I submitted written questions on other aspects of the agreements. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the questions to Mr. Pickering with respect to the agreements, and his answers thereto, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

Of course, the United Nations faces challenges within its own organization. The United Nations continues to hire Soviets—one suspects KGB agents—to staff the United Nations. Indeed, to some appearances, the United Nations has become merely an extension of Soviet foreign policy. U.N. expenses continue to be exorbitant, and of course, despite all the ranting and raving against the United States, when it comes to money, they expect Uncle Sam to pick up the tab.

The United States has withdrawn from several U.N. agencies in protest of their policies and practices. We've withheld U.S. contributions in other cases—in hopes of forcing reforms. Yet we seem to be getting only reformed rhetoric from U.N. officials—trying to portray cosmetic changes as real reform.

Meanwhile the Soviets have intensified their strategy for forging world opinion through the United Nations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from written questions submitted to Ambassador Pickering, and his responses thereto, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Pickering has been the subject of some criticism for his involvement in assisting the freedom fighters in Nicaragua during his tenure as United States Ambassador to El Salvador. Frankly, having examined the record, I find no fault with Mr. Pickering's judgment or activities in this regard.

For instance, we discussed at his confirmation hearing the fact that many people misunderstood, and even still misunderstand, the so-called Boland amendment. There was nothing in that amendment—actually any of the five separate Boland amendments—which prohibited private assistance by groups outside the U.S. Government to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. Thus, Mr. Pickering's assistance in arranging a secret donation of $1 million of military equipment to the Contras was in no way a violation of the Boland amendment.

Indeed, the prohibition did not restrict the President, his ambassadors—including Mr. Pickering—or officials of the National Security Council from considering ways to get non-U.S. Government funds to help the Contras.

I do have concerns about Mr. Pickering's involvement, while he served in El Salvador, in internal political affairs. In 1984, it was reported that the CIA channeled $2 million into El Salvador to assist political parties opposed to the ARENA party. Written questions on his involvement were submitted for the record, as well as questions dealing with his more recent tenure in Israel and other U.N.-related issues. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the questions submitted to Mr. Pickering, and his answers thereto, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

Specifically, Mr. President, I remain troubled by Mr. Pickering's role in opposing the ARENA party and some of its members during his tenure in El Salvador. I am also troubled by Mr. Pickering's conflicting comments regarding a list of names he submitted to the Salvadoran Government in 1983 in light of their connections or presumed connections with death squads and other illegal military activities.

During his confirmation hearing to be Ambassador to Israel, on June 20, 1985, Mr. Pickering acknowledged having transmitted a list of military officers—who—should be asked to leave the country in light of their connections or presumed connections with death squads and other illegal military activities.

He further stated in 1985:

The list included a number of military names who were subject to Salvadoran Government control which we asked be exiled or assigned overseas for a period of time, and a number of civilians that we asked the Government to interview to ask to leave the country if they were willing, if not, to have the Government make clear to those individuals that the Government was investigating and reviewing their activities on an intensive basis.

In 1985, Mr. Pickering also stated that there was no other reason for names being on the list than alleged death squad connections. In 1989, however, Mr. Pickering claims, "The criteria used for compiling this list of Salvadoran officers did not include connections with death squads." While he used the term "exiled" in 1985, he now describes the individuals as having been reassigned overseas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the relevant excerpts from the 1985 hearing be printed at this point in the RECORD followed by the series of questions submitted this year, and Mr. Pickering's answers.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM JUNE 20, 1985, CONFIRMATION HEARING OF THOMAS R. PICKERING

Senator HELMS. While you were ambassador to El Salvador, did the United States government ever give you a list of names, either in writing or verbally, or did they give such a list to the Salvadoran government, asking recommending, whatever, that the people on the list be sent out of the country?

Ambassador PICKERING. Yes. In connection with Vice President Bush's visit on December 11 or 12, 1983, one of the points that Vice President Bush made to the Salvadorans with whom he met, including the top leadership of the army, some 20 military commanders, that a certain number of Salvadoran military officers should be asked to leave the country in light of their connections or presumed connections with death squads and other illegal military activities. I transmitted that list to the Salvadoran government in connection with his visit and his request.

Senator HELMS. Did it include any civilian names?

Ambassador PICKERING. The list included a number of military names who were subject to Salvadoran government control which we asked be exiled or assigned overseas for a period of time, and a number of civilians that we asked the government to interview to ask to leave the country if they were willing, if not, to have the government make clear to those individuals that the government was investigating and reviewing their activities on an intensive basis.

Senator HELMS. You mentioned alleged death squad connections, whatever. Was there any other reason for the names being on the list?

Ambassador PICKERING. To the best of my knowledge, no, sir.

Senator HELMS. Did the Salvadoran government resist attempts to exile these people?

Ambassador PICKERING. No, sir.

Senator HELMS. Were they in fact exiled?

Ambassador PICKERING. They were sent overseas, yes, sir.

Senator HELMS. All of them?

Ambassador PICKERING. Yes, sir, all of the military.

Senator HELMS. But no civilians?

Ambassador PICKERING. The civilians were not subject to government control, and none of those civilians to my knowledge chose to go overseas.

Senator HELMS. Did the Salvadoran government present any proof or hold any trials before these people were exiled?

Ambassador PICKERING. They did not, or not to my knowledge.

Senator HELMS. What do you think about that?

Ambassador PICKERING. I think it was a measure required under the circumstances. It is a measure that at least in terms of what happened afterward may have had a salubrious effect on the situation.

Senator HELMS. Well, I guess the natural question was did our government present any proof that these persons were in fact involved in criminal activities?

Ambassador PICKERING. Our government presented such information as it had available which could continue at the same time to permit us to protect intelligence sources and methods.

Senator HELMS. Was any information collected by our intelligence——

Ambassador PICKERING. No, it presented such information as was available to the United States government but in a fashion which would continue to permit us to protect intelligence sources and methods.

Senator HELMS. Well, where did the information come from if it did not come from our own intelligence capabilities?

Ambassador PICKERING. I wanted to make certain you understood what I had said earlier.

Senator HELMS. I understood what you said.

Ambassador PICKERING. I would say the bulk, if not all, but I cannot speak—I am trying to cast my mind back almost two years—the bulk if not all of that information did come from intelligence sources. It was presented in a fashion that would not betray intelligence sources and methods, to protect intelligence sources and methods.

Senator HELMS. Any of it hearsay?

Ambassador PICKERING. To the best of my knowledge, and I am not a lawyer, or a very good share, if it was firsthand testimony. I am not a lawyer.

Senator HELMS. That is fair enough. Neither am I, and I am glad of it. * * *

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS FOLLOWING FEBRUARY 23, 1989, CONFIRMATION HEARING OF THOMAS R. PICKERING

ARBITRARY EXILE

1. Q. My understanding is that the United States considers arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile to be human rights abuses, and analyzes each country's respect for human rights on that basis in the annual human rights report to Congress. Is that accurate?

A. We do consider arbitrary arrest, deportation, and other arbitrary actions to be human rights abuses.

2. Q. For instance, the 1988 Human Rights Report reports that in Israel,

"Thirty six Palestinians were deported in 1988, compared to nine in 1987. These deportations contravene the Fourth Geneva Convention in the view of the United States. The Israel Supreme Court has disagreed in a formal decision."

But I'm curious about the U.S. position on forced or arbitrary exile in Israel, where you served, compared to that in El Salvador, when you served there. In your previous confirmation hearing, in 1985, you acknowledged that in 1983 you had participated in conveying to the government of El Salvador a list of military officers and civilians that the U.S. recommended be exiled from El Salvador. You described the reason for this request as due to "their connections or presumed connections with death squads and other illegal military activities".

A. The provision of the list to the government of El Salvador with respect to investigating possible abuses of authority and the prosecution or reassignment of military officers if abuses occurred was not tied to any request by the U.S. Government to deport those officers. In my recollection the U.S. did not specifically request that the government of El Salvador deport military officers. The military officers and civilians in El Salvador concerned were, to the extent that they were sent abroad, subject to the authority and orders of the government.

Israel views deportation of Palestinian civilians from the West Bank and Gaza as a necessary and effective security measure. We do not share this view. If Israel believes persons have violated security regulations, they should be charged, tried, and, if found guilty, sentenced in the course of an open legal process, which permits them to defend themselves properly. Deportations stir up Palestinian resentment, inhibiting the return of an atmosphere of calm in the occupied territories. Also in the U.S. view, deportation contravenes the Fourth Geneva Convention for the protection of civilians.

Q. (a) How many military officers were sent into exile?

A. The officers on this list were relieved of command and re-assigned, some were sent overseas as military attaches. In no way were these individuals deported; they were sent abroad to represent the government of El Salvador.

Q. (b) Do all of these individuals remain in exile today?

Q. (c) Where are they in exile?

Q. (d) Did you participate in the decision to ask for these individuals to be exiled?

A. I did not participate in making the decision, although I was asked for my ideas and recommendations in this regard. I supported the decision, which was made in Washington, to seek the reassignment of the military officers insofar as the government of El Salvador found that there was some cause to suggest that abuses occurred under their command.

Q. (e) Has it been U.S. policy to exclude these individuals from entering the United States?

A. I do not know just who put the list together in Washington, but I do know that the White House requested that such a list be drawn up and that it be transmitted to the government in El Salvador in connection with then Vice President Bush's visit to El Salvador. I believe that some of these officers were subsequently placed on the visa lookout list.

Q. (f) What was the basis of the inclusion of names on the list presented to the Salvadoran government?

A. The basis for inclusion of the names on the list presented to El Salvador government was the available information in the files of the United States government on their activities.

2. Q. Your 1985 description was of "connections or presumed connections" to death squads and other illegal military activities. Was the basis of inclusion on the list proven connection to death squads or merely "presumed connection"?

A. The criteria used for compiling this list of Salvadoran officers did not include connections with death squads. These related to the full range of reports of abuses of authority and human rights violations committed either directly by these officers or carried out by individuals under their command. Our efforts then (as I believe they still are now) were designed to assist the government of El Salvador and the military high command in holding officers accountable for their actions and those of their subordinates as they relate to repeated instances of human rights abuses.

3. Q. Did the United States provide evidence to the government of El Salvador to support its accusations?

A. The criteria used for compiling this list of Salvadoran officers did not include connections with death squads. These related to the full range of reports of abuses of authority and human rights violations committed either directly by these officers or carried out by individuals under their command. Our efforts then (as I believe they still are now) were designed to assist the government of El Salvador and the military high command in holding officers accountable for their actions and those of their subordinates as they relate to repeated instances of human rights abuses. Our concern about the links of these officers with repeated abuses of authority were well known to the military high command and the government as they were the subject of an on-going dialogue between us.

4. Q. Is it my understanding that the United States has long pressed the government of El Salvador to expedite the judicial process in connection with the killing of Archbishop Romero, the nuns, the others. Has that been the position?

A. The answer is yes.

5. Q. Why would the United States support taking unilateral actions against Salvadoran citizens—military or civilian—without benefit of charge, evidence, trial, or other proper opportunity to defend themselves against these accusations?

A. The U.S. Government is not engaged in taking unilateral actions against Salvadoran citizens. Rather, we support the efforts of the Government of El Salvador to revamp their justice system to make it more responsive to the needs of the Salvadoran people.

The U.S. has long maintained that all Salvadorans must be held accountable for their actions under an impartial rule of law. U.S. government support to the country's judicial system seeks to bring about an impartial and efficient system of law as the only real lasting guarantee against the actions of extremists from both the left and the right.

6. Q. Who prepared the list that was presented to the government of El Salvador?

A. I do not know who prepared the list; however, I do know that the list was prepared at the direction of the White House and that it was to be delivered to the Salvadorans in conjunction with the visit of then Vice President Bush. The U.S. Government to my knowledge has never demanded that Salvadoran citizens be exiled.

7. Q. Has the United States ever demanded, verbally or in writing, that other Salvadorans be exiled based on their connection to death squads or other illegal activities in El Salvador?

A. Other than this particular case the answer is, to the best of my knowledge, no. However, the word "exiled" is misplaced. We asked for reassignment for the individuals overseas and for the government to persuade those not subject to its control to leave for a period of time.

8. Q. Has the United States ever demanded, verbally or in writing, that other Salvadorans be exiled based on their connection to Marxist terrorist organizations in El Salvador, such as the FMLN?

A. Since individuals who participate in Marxist terrorist organizations in El Salvador are subject to prison terms within the country, we have not sought their removal from the country.

9. Q. Has the United States ever demanded of any other country that it exile members of its military, or civilians—for any reason?

A. To the best of my knowledge, no.

10. Q. What would be the position of the United States if another country demanded that the U.S. Government exile any members of our military, or station them abroad?

A. This is a hypothetical question. I presume that we would look at it, under the circumstances and in the light of the conditions in which such a proposal was made, which is exactly what the government of El Salvador did.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I take the time to outline this issue with some specificity because I believe it represents one of the most disappointing examples of supposed U.S. diplomacy. The United States, a great beacon of liberty and democracy, conveys to a small Central American neighbor—a country also struggling for democracy—that it should exile some of its military personnel because of U.S. allegations of death squad activities. Yet proof for these allegations is never presented, no opportunity to address the charges is given to the Salvadorans, no trial, no process whatsoever.

It is shabby treatment for any country and especially for a friend and ally that respects our country. While Mr. Pickering does not answer some of the questions, I am informed that in fact all of those forcibly exiled at United States request remain outside of El Salvador and that the United States has prevented their entry, even on a visiting basis, into the United States—including at least one request based on the need to visit a sick relative.

FUNDING FOR THE PLO AND SWAPO

Question. Section 114(a) of the Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985, requires a reduction in U.S. assessed contributions to the United Nations and its affiliated agencies for projects providing benefits to the Palestine Liberation Organization (or entities associated with it) or to the South West Africa People's Organization.

Please provide a list of all occasions on which the U.S. withheld contributions because the UN's projects benefited (1) the PLO and (2) SWAPO, as well as the amounts withheld.

Answer. The U.S. began withholding its share of the amount budgeted by the UN for certain activities benefiting the PLO in FY 1980. U.S. withholdings for SWAPO activities began in FY 1984. Through FY 1989, cumulative U.S. withholdings for PLO/SWAPO activities from the UN regular budget total approximately $9.37 million.

Question. Are these withheld contributions considered, by the UN or the U.S., as part of the "arrearages" which the U.S. owes to the United Nations?

Answer. The UN considers these withholdings—indeed, any unpaid assessment to the regular budget—to be an arrearage if it is not paid during the year in which the amount was assessed. These withheld contributions are not considered part of the arrearages which the U.S. plans to repay the United Nations.

Question. Please provide a summary of the amounts spent by the UN and its affiliated agencies during the past 7 fiscal years on behalf of the PLO and SWAPO.

Answer. Based on UN data which we request for withholding purposes, the UN has identified approximately $41.8 million in expenditures for PLO/SWAPO activities for the past 7 years (note: includes early estimates for CY 1988; actual amounts are pending final reconciliations of accounts by the UN). Regarding the affiliated agencies, the U.S. requires agency certification that regular budget funds are not being spent on behalf of the PLO and SWAPO before appropriated amounts can be paid to the agencies. In accord with responses received from the affiliated agencies, we have not withheld funds from the agencies for either PLO or SWAPO activities.

Question. For the PLO, please include, individually, for each fiscal year, amounts spent through the Committee on the Exercise for the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights, the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories, and the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, as well as any other entity which is considered to provide support to the PLO.

Answer. Based on available UN data, the following is a yearly breakdown of UN expenditures on PLO/Palestinian activities and the Second Decade to Combat Racism. The 1988 (FY 1989) figures are estimates pending final reconciliation of accounts.

AMOUNTS BY YEAR

1982 FY83	1983 FY84	1984 FY85	1985 FY86	1986 FY87	1987 FY88	1988 FY89
5,277.8	6,912	5,365.6	5,849.1	5,394.7	5,369.1	5,394.6

Question. For SWAPO, please include, individually, for each fiscal year, amounts spent through the United Nations Council for Namibia, the United Nations Fund for Namibia, the United Nations Institute for Namibia, the Nationhood Programme for Namibia, and the Office of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia.

Answer. Two factors should be noted concerning expenditure data for the above activities: (1) the UN Fund for Namibia and the UN Institute for Namibia are individual trust funds of the UN and, consequently, are funded from voluntary (not assessed) contributions; (2) although the UN Council for Namibia, the Nationhood Program for Namibia and the Office of the UN Commissioner for Namibia are included in the UN regular budget, the budget does not provide a breakdown of amounts earmarked specifically for SWAPO activities. This is a significant distinction since these three regular budget items entail funding of a cross-section of Namibian activities which go well beyond support of just SWAPO.

However, because we withhold a share of our assessed contribution for SWAPO activities, the UN, at our request, provides us with annual estimates of regular budget SWAPO expenditures. The amounts thus provided are as follows (note: regular budget withholdings began in CY 84/FY 85; CY 88/FY 89 amounts are estimates pending final reconciliation of UN accounts):

AMOUNTS BY YEAR

1984 FY85	1985 FY86	1986 FY87	1987 FY88	1988 FY89

WALVIS BAY

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Is it clearly understood and recognized by the United Nations that Walvis Bay is not a part of Namibia and will remain sovereign territory of South Africa?

Answer. The status of Walvis Bay is addressed in Security Council Resolution 432 of 27 June 1978 and in the formal statement by Secretary Vance of the same date on behalf of the five Contact Group members. (Copies are attached.) Resolution 432 calls for the re-integration of Walvis Bay into Namibia. It remains the U.S. position that all aspects of the question of Walvis Bay must be subject to discussion between the South African Government and the elected Government of Namibia following independence.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: What, if any, participation in the Namibian elections will individuals have who (1) live in Walvis Bay, but were born in Namibia, and (2) live in Namibia, but were born in Walvis Bay?

Answer. The July 27, 1978, statement by Secretary of State Vance on behalf of the Western Contact Group quoted an earlier statement by a Contact Group spokesman as follows: "We have obtained assurances (from South Africa) that . . . Namibians in Walvis Bay will be able to participate in the political life of the territory during the transitional period, including voting in the elections." Precisely who will be able to vote will probably hinge on how the definition of a "Namibian" is ultimately arrived at with respect to such persons, i.e., whether persons born in Walvis Bay are in fact legally deemed to be Namibians or may choose to be so deemed.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Some have alleged that the South African military presence has been increased in Walvis Bay since the December 22, 1988, signing of the agreement. Is that the case? Has SWAPO threatened to disavow, or disrupt, implementation of UN Resolution 435 if South Africa withdraws some of its troops to Walvis Bay?

Answer. On January 27, SADF Chief of Staff Geldenhuys announced that South Africa would not increase its garrison in Walvis Bay during the independence process. Although we have seen reported rumors that South Africa has increased its military presence in Walvis Bay in the past two months, we have seen no evidence that this has occurred. We believe that all parties involved in the process of achieving independence in Namibia are committed to its successful conclusion and that UNTAG will faithfully carry out its mission of resolving disputes.

ANC CAMPS

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: As I understand it, the agreement will result in the removal from Angola of training camps for the African National Congress. Where will these camps be relocated?

Answer. ANC officials have said that several African countries have offered facilities to replace those that the ANC is leaving in Angola. The ANC has not indicated which offer(s) it plans to accept.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Who will arrange for the transportation to the new location(s)?

Answer: The ANC stated that it will handle arrangements for the resettlement of ANC personnel in Angola.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: There have been several reports, including one by the Committee staff, that the ANC maintains "detainees" in association with its camps. Who will ensure that those associated with the ANC who are relocated are not being held against their will by the ANC?

Answer: To our knowledge, no formal arrangements have been made for any group to exercise a monitoring function over the process of relocating persons in ANC camps in Angola to other countries.

POLITICAL PRISONERS

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: How many political prisoners or political detainees are held in Namibia?

Answer: No definitive number or list of political prisoners and detainees in Namibia is available. Many persons are in detention for a short period and are released without being charged. On December 12, 1988, the Namibia Communications Centre (London) released a list of 38 persons "in detention for political reasons in Namibia."

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Does the U.S. recognize, and does the U.N. acknowledge, that individuals charged with, or convicted of, indiscriminate acts of killing and terrorism against civilians in Namibia are not "political prisoners or political detainees" within the meaning of U.N. Resolution 435, and thus are not required to be released prior to the beginning of the election campaign?

Answer. We are not aware whether individuals currently serving prison sentences or being tried for recent bombings in Namibia are regarded as "political prisoners or political detainees" by the United Nations Special Representative. Clearly, any case of this sort must be carefully evaluated on an individual basis.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Who is the "jurist of international standing" that has been designated to assist the U.N.'s Special Representative?

Answer. The U.N. intends to appoint three jurists to assist the Secretary-General's Special Representative during the Namibian transition to independence. Two of these persons have already been nominated:

Prof. Karl Aage Norgaard, of Denmark, President of the European Human Rights Commission.

Andrew Grotrian, Esq., of Scotland, a former member of the European Human Rights Commission. The third member will be nominated before implementation of Resolution 435 begins on April 1.

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: How many Americans have been killed as a result of terrorism in Namibia? Please detail.

Answer. We have no information that American citizens have been killed by acts of terrorism in Namibia. Since UNSCR 435 was passed, two Americans have been killed by violence in Namibia, Foreign Service Officer Dennis Keogh and U.S. Army Lt. Col. Kenneth Crabtree. They were killed in a bomb blast at a gas station in Ovamboland, northern Namibia, on April 15, 1984. No organization has claimed responsibility for this incident and we have never been able to identify the perpetrators.

ADDENDA TO UN RESOLUTION 435

Senator HELMS. Follow-up: Please provide a description, and when applicable the text, of all modifications, understanding, and interpretations—verbal and written—on the implementation of U.N. Resolution 435 since its adoption by the U.N. in 1978 which will govern the implementation of that resolution.

Answer. The following subsequent understandings and agreements are expressly noted in the further report of the Secretary General, dated 23 January 1989 (UN Document S/20412, attached), concerning the implementation of Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 439 (1978) concerning the question of Namibia:

(a) The agreement reached in 1982 that UNTAG, with the cooperation of host Governments and in the context of implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978), would monitor SWAPO bases in Angola and Zambia (contained in UN Document S/15776, attached);

(b) Informal understandings reached in 1982 on the question of impartiality (discussed in paragraph 36 of the Secretary General's "further report"; the text of this so-called "impartiality package" has not yet been circulated as a UN document or otherwise officially made public);

(c) The text of the Principles concerning the Constitutent Assembly and the Constitution of an indpendent Namibia which was transmitted to the Secretary General on 12 July 1982 (UN Document S/15287, attached); and

(d) The agreement reached in November 1985 (UN Document 17658, attached) on the system of proportional representation for the elections envisaged in Security Council Resolution 435 (1978).

In addition to the Secretary General's "further report" noted above, the following recent UN resolutions and reports (a, b, and c attached) are of direct importance to the implementation of Resolution 435:

(a) UN Security Council Resolution 629 of 16 January 1989 (which, inter alia, requested the Secretary General to prepare a report on the implementation of Resolution 435 taking into account all relevant development since the adoption of that resolution);

(b) The Secretary General's explanatory statement of 9 February 1989 (S/20457);

(c) Security Council Resolution 632 of 16 February 1989 (approving the Secretary General's further report and explanatory statement); and

(d) General Assembly Resolution of 1 March 1989 approving the UN Transition Assistance Group budget (text not yet available).

In addition to the above documents, other understanding have been reached during the course of the past ten years, in conversations which are considered confidential by the participating parties. A briefing on these additional elements of implementation can be provided according to the normal procedures covering classified materials.

SECONDMENT

Question. 1. The UN Reform Law calls for "progress towards a 50 percent limitation" on the practice of so-called "secondment"—that is, the Soviet practice of detailing Soviet government employees—most of them KGB agents—to the UN bureaucary. I understand that only 3 of these spies out of a total of 184 seconded employees have been dismissed.

(a) Is that "progress"? What would you consider progress?

(b) Isn't this a UN problem rather than a Soviet or U.S. one?

(c) Will you press the Secretary-General to reduce the number of seconded employees from any one country to no more than 50%?

He has the authority to do this by simply not renewing any short-term contracts until the number of those on genuine career status is equal to 50% of the total number of employees from that country.

Answer. 1. (a) We believe the commitment of the Soviet Union in principle to move from their long-established policy of seconding all of their nationals to a policy of permitting the permanent assignment of employees to the UN Secretariat is a step in the right direction. The fact that three of over 184 seconded employees have been shifted to a more permanent basis can be viewed as a beginning step. We will put very high priority on continuing to work on this issue to achieve greater progress.

(b) Action on this issue is mostly in the hands of the UN and the Soviets, and thus it is largely their problem rather than ours. As the host country and a state fully committed to the United Nations Charter, we would want to see Soviets assigned to the United Nations Secretariat as independent international civil servants. The Soviet practice of seconding all of their nationals is contrary to the spirit of an independent civil service, but it should be noted that there are no specific UN rules or resolutions that prohibit the practice.

(c) We are continuing to press the Secretary-General to reduce the number of seconded employees from any one member state to no more than 50%. This is the United States policy and, of course, I fully agree with it. We agree that the Secretary-General's capacity to work in this area is based on his readiness to strongly urge a reduction of short-term contracts for seconded Soviet employees. In implementing the reduction of seconded employees, we are mindful of the need for exceptions for small developing countries that are unable to spare their experienced diplomats for permanent assignments to the UN.

UN HOUSING

Question. 1. I believe we all have a responsibility to see that Federal dollars are spent wisely. In FY-88 the U.S. Mission to the UN had an operating budget of some $4 million per year and one-half of the budget—$2 million—was used to provide housing for some 44 employees. What justification is there for such an extraordinary amount of money?

Answer. My predecessor at the United Nations has already undertaken significant steps to reduce the amount of our budget and devote it to the housing program. Last year the housing program was reduced from a permitted 45 leases to about half the size—18 leases for Foreign Service Officers, 2 for political appointees, and leases for the other USUN Ambassadors. In addition, the State Department is completing negotiations now to release 10 of our highest-cost leases in that regard.

Question. 2. Are other Federal employees serving in the New York metropolitan area afforded housing benefits.

Answer. The FBI has a new program whereby its agents are given a 25 percent salary increase for serving in New York City, as well as a $20,000 bonus.

Question. 3. (a) To your knowledge, does the American taxpayer subsidize the housing for the Ambassador to the Organization of American States (OAS)?

(b) Would you agree that the OAS is an international organization like the UN that resides in the United States?

Answer. (a) Not to my knowledge.

(b) Yes.

Question. 4. What justification can you give the American taxpayer for the substantial housing allowances that are given to UN employees but not given to other Federal employees, including the heads of other international organizations?

Answer. The justification for housing allowances or benefits which are given to employees of the United States Mission to the United Nations are home-based on the fact that Foreign Service employees serve very short tours of duty in New York, and it is not possible for them to acquire housing on the same basis as those who are permanently assigned. The purpose of the allowance structure should be to provide for financial equivalence on an average basis so that Foreign Service personnel can be recruited and assigned to serve in New York without a financial penalty over what their average costs would be in Washington.

Question. 5. In your view, is it necessary for the American taxpayer to subsidize housing for the Deputy Permanent Representative, which in 1987 amounted to $85,000?

Answer. On the thesis above, it is necessary, in one fashion or another, for the United States to meet the additional costs of living and working in New York. We attempt to do so at costs which are as effective and as low as possible.

Question. 6. Do you think that the maintenance of living quarters for the Deputy Permanent Representative should include a maid costing the taxpayers $20,000 and a collection of rented furniture costing the taxpayers another $18,000?

Answer. It is noteworthy, I believe, that the legislation enacted by Congress last year, which substantially reduced the housing program, specifically provides for the Deputy Permanent Representative to receive living quarters expenses similar to those authorized for Foreign Service personnel serving abroad.

POPULATION

MEXICO CITY POLICY

Question. 1. As you know, at the July 1984 Conference on Population in Mexico City, the U.S. delegation enunciated what has since been called, "The Mexico City Policy" which states that no U.S. population assistance funds would go to private organizations which "perform or actively promote abortion as a method of family planning in other nations."

Answer. I support the 1984 policy.

UNFPA

Question. 1. I am sure you are familiar with communist China's one-child-per-couple policy. In a document issued in May 1988, the U.S. Census Bureau reported that the Chinese government condones coercive abortion and sterilization as a means to meet the yearly birth quota.

(a) Do you support forcing or coercing women to kill their unborn children as a means to control the birth rate in a country?

Answer. No.

Question. (b) Do you support coercing or forcing women to use contraceptives as a means to control the birth rate in a country?

Answer. No.

Question. (c) Do you support mandatory or coerced sterilization as a means to control the birth rate in a country?

Answer. No.

Question. 2. The United Nations Fund for Population Affairs contributes funds to the China population program. Under U.S. Law no federal tax dollars can be used to pay for or coerce an individual to obtain an abortion or undergo sterilization. In 1985, the government reduced its funding to UNFPA and since 1986 the government has not funded the program at all.

(a) Do you support U.S. policy?

Answer. Yes.

Question. 3. According to a January 3, Christian Science Monitor article, in the next few months, the United Nations will consider changes in the UNFPA program. The UNFPA will not participate in China's population census-taking and analysis. Rather, it will concentrate on three areas:

(1) Maternal and child health planning in rural areas;

(2) Contraceptive production and research;

(3) Training demographers to conduct projects to address the needs of China's aging population and to help rural women become more economically self-reliant.

Would these proposed changes be sufficient to warrant renewed U.S. support for UNFPA.

Answer. The United States would have to study not only the aspects of the program which the UNFPA undertakes, but also what is happening with respect to Chinese policy on the issues of coercive abortion and forced sterilization and how and in what way the UNFPA program specifically relates to these activities. It would be premature therefore to give an answer to the question without further and fuller study.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the nomination by President Bush of Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering to be the U.S. Representative to the United Nations. Ambassador Pickering has served in the Foreign Service for 30 years and is uniquely qualified for this position.

In 1953, Ambassador Pickering, a native of New Jersey, graduated from Bowdoin College in Maine and went on to earn two masters degrees—one from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and the other from the University of Melbourne in Australia. Upon completion of his education, Ambassador Pickering dutifully served his country in the U.S. Navy for 3 years.

Ambassador Pickering joined the Foreign Service in 1959 as an intelligence research specialist and subsequently held several different positions in the State Department including political officer in Geneva on detail to the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. He received intensive Swahili language training prior to serving as the principal officer to Zanzibar. After 2 years as Deputy Chief of Mission in Dar Es Salaam, Tanzania and 4 years as Deputy Director of Political Military Affairs at the State Department, he became Special Assistant to the Secretary of State and Executive Secretary of the Department of State.

Ambassador Pickering was last named to an ambassadorship in 1974 when he became Ambassador to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. Following that first diplomatic position, he served as Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs at the Department of State. In 1981, he was named Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Nigeria and served in that capacity for 2 years. He became Ambassador to El Salvador in 1983 and was named Ambassador to Israel in 1985 in which position he is currently serving.

Ambassador Pickering's experience and expertise in the Foreign Service make him an excellent candidate for the position of U.S. Representative to the United Nations. His diplomatic talents have served him well in many sensitive positions and he has represented the United States abroad with honor and integrity.

In closing, President Bush has made an excellent choice of Ambassador Pickering. Clearly, he has the ability and the qualifications to ably represent our country at the United Nations.

I suggest to my colleagues that they swiftly approve his nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). Who yields time?

The Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PELL. How much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes, forty-two seconds.

Mr. PELL. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations for finding time for these remarks.

Mr. President, I rise to congratulate President Bush on his nomination of Ambassador Pickering. It is surely the case that there has never been an American President better qualified to choose a Permanent Representative to the United Nations, having himself served in that role.

In 1971, I had the great honor to serve on the U.S. delegation to the General Assembly of that year with then-Ambassador Bush, now President Bush. I watched his performance then with great respect and admiration. President Bush's nomination of Ambassador Pickering has earned him still more respect and admiration from this Senator.

This is a moment, Mr. President, of renewed hope and, indeed, I might even say expectations for the United Nations system. We have seen the United Nation's great potential for peacekeeping. Where the world and the principal adversaries want a measure of peace, the United Nations can witness that the peace is being kept. We look forward to a role of the United Nations in Afghanistan. It will be a tormented and difficult transition from civil war to something like a stable civil regime.

For our part, Mr. President, I think it would be agreed that in the context of these new expectations, the United States needs to get itself into a good working relationship again with the United Nations. We must pay our dues, which is an elemental responsibility. I can only note the others have come along and paid theirs. We are in an awkward position and an undesirable one.

We should also reconsider, as the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Foreign Relations is prepared to do, our decision to leave Unesco. Unesco has responded to our having left, and in that context, the Committee on Foreign Relations will hold hearings. We will see what the judgment of persons with views on this matter may be, and we will decide in an open way whether we should rejoin. When we left the International Labor Organization in 1977, we said we did not mean to leave but would stay out until the organization changed its ways. It did, and we rejoined. Perhaps the time has come for Unesco.

In closing, though the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina has mentioned this, I, too, would like to note Mr. Pickering is a graduate of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise to commend the President of the United States for selecting Mr. Pickering to become our Ambassador——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time to the Senator?

Mr. WARNER. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor. I did not realize we are under a time agreement.

Mr. HELMS. How about 2 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina controls 7 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I will be very brief because there may well be other Senators who would like to speak.

I have had the privilege of having a personal relationship of some several years with the nominee to become Ambassador to the United Nations. At a time when the United Nations is playing an increasingly critical role in achieving peace in the world, whether it be in Angola, Afghanistan, or the Persian Gulf, the United States must be represented by a person with a wealth of knowledge and diplomatic experience. Ambassador Pickering is such a person.

Tom Pickering joined the Foreign Service in 1959. During the 1960's he served in Geneva, Zanzibar, and Tanzania before returning to Washington to become Deputy Director of the Bureau of Political-Military Affairs and later, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State and Executive Secretary of the Department.

In 1974, Tom Pickering began a series of appointments as United States Ambassador—to the Kingdom of Jordan from 1974 to 1978; to Nigeria from 1981 to 1983; to El Salvador from 1983 to 1985; and to Israel from 1985 to 1988.

Throughout his career in the Foreign Service, Ambassador Pickering has performed in a manner that has earned him praise and respect. I am proud to support his nomination as U.N. Ambassador and honored that he will be representating the United States in this important international organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, may I inquire how much time remains on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes, twenty-three seconds.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, how much time remains on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes, fourteen seconds.

Mr. PELL. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Thomas Pickering is an outstanding choice to represent the United States at the United Nations.

I can think of no one better qualified for this important post, no one in whom we could have more confidence, and no one who would more surely serve with distinction.

I commend President Bush for his decision to nominate Thomas Pickering to be the Representative of the United States to the United Nations.

Mr. Pickering has dedicated 30 years of his life to the Foreign Service. In so doing, he has become one of a handful of individuals to have gained the personal rank of Career Ambassador, a truly notable honor.

His wide-ranging experience includes service as Ambassador to Jordan, Nigeria, El Salvador, and most recently Israel. In each of these positions, he has been a thoughtful and effective American representative. The regard in which he is held overseas is equaled by the respect accorded him at home.

I am particularly pleased that Mr. Pickering will be at the United Nations during this exciting period in the organization's history.

The United Nations has become increasingly active in the past year in a number of important international issues and in the mediation of regional conflicts. The 1988 Nobel Peace Prize awarded to U.N. peacekeeping forces is testimony to the valuable contribution of the United Nations to global stability.

Thomas Pickering can bring to the United Nations a unique perspective and impressive breadth of experience and knowledge. He is well prepared to expertly represent our country in this important body and contribute to the positive work of the United Nations.

I am pleased to have the honor to vote this afternoon to confirm Thomas Pickering to be the U.S. Representative to the United Nations.

I thank the distinguished chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

Mr. President, no amount of time would allow me sufficient time to put into the RECORD the confidence that I feel in the nominee for an important post. The spokesman for the United States at the United Nations is himself a symbol of the kind of America that we wish to project not only to the free world, but to those who would choose to be free.

Ambassador Pickering has had already a most distinguished career. He has been tested, sorely tested by being posted to some of the most difficult and challenging posts that are available to test the metal of a career Foreign Service officer. He has distinguished himself repeatedly.

He is a man of integrity, a man of considerable diplomatic skills, but perhaps most of all, a man of character and courage, a man who will be able to articulate with conviction the policies of the United States in a forum in which all too often the United States has been castigated, has been ignored, has been put down.

There are some who, as a result of the inequity of the treatment given us in that forum, have been inclined to think that the importance of that post has been minimized; that, indeed, the ideals which prompted so many of us to rejoice in its formation have been abandoned so frequently in the conduct of its affairs that it has hauled into question the very utility of that body.

But I think most of us understand this world is a shrinking neighborhood, that there is a requirement that we conduct ourselves even with our enemies in a way that leaves no doubt as to our purpose and leaves no doubt as to the genuineness of our commitment to the ideals that prompted formation of that body.

Mr. President, I will conclude simply by stating that I think the President is to be congratulated on a superb choice, one I am sure will enjoy widespread, perhaps unanimous bipartisan support.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, may I inquire how much more time I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes and forty seconds.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering for the position of Ambassador to the United Nations.

I cannot imagine a better choice for this critical and extremely sensitive post, and not only because he is from New Jersey. Ambassador Pickering has diplomatic experience on three continents and is held in high regard in the diplomatic community. His background and performance in the foreign service, including his service as Ambassador to Jordan, El Salvador, and Israel, clearly demonstrate his qualifications for the job.

Ambassador Pickering's credentials are outstanding and well known. I would like to speak more personally, for a moment, about those intangible qualities that make Ambassador Pickering a truly outstanding diplomat. I first met Tom Pickering as Ambassador to El Salvador when I consulted with him at length about the murder of Ita Ford, one of the four churchwomen brutally slain in El Salvador.

Ita Ford was from New Jersey. At the time I dealt with Tom Pickering on this issue, the murder of the churchwomen had not yet been resolved and ensuring that the murderers were brought to justice in El Salvador was a matter of great concern to me and to the Congress. The Congress had voted to impose conditions on aid to El Salvador pending a verdict in the case and El Salvador was in the midst of a Presidential campaign.

In these difficult circumstances, Tom Pickering was most helpful in conveying my concern and that of William Ford, Ita's brother, to the State Department and the Salvadoran Government. He went out of his way to keep me informed of developments in the case, ever mindful of the constraints imposed by his position as Ambassador.

His insight and deep understanding of the political dynamics of El Salvador were apparent when I visited that country in 1984, and he willingly shared his knowledge with me. He brought to his difficult assignment a finely tuned sense of how to balance national security concerns, domestic concerns, and the Senate's desire to be involved in the foreign policy process. Throughout my dealings with Tom Pickering, I have been impressed with his integrity, his wisdom, and his ability to handle difficult situations with sensitivity. His tenure as Ambassador to Israel has only confirmed this judgment in my mind.

I have great confidence in Ambassador Pickering's ability to represent our country at the United Nations at a time when the role of the United Nations in resolving world conflicts is on the rise, and when the Soviet Union has shown new interest in participating in that forum. America must respond to the new and difficult challenges posed by President Gorbachev's new initiatives with skillful and creative diplomacy of our own, on the world stage and especially at the United Nations.

In my mind, there is no doubt Ambassador Pickering is the man to help us do so at the United Nations. I urge my colleagues to support this nomination.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the other distinguished Senators who have spoken, in commending to the Senate the nomination of Ambassador Thomas Pickering as our Ambassador to the United Nations.

Tom Pickering has been one of our most distinguished career diplomats, and one of our most experienced. He has served as Ambassador to four countries where the United States has important interests—Jordan, Nigeria, El Salvador, and most recently, Israel. At each of those posts, and throughout his diplomatic career, he has served this country with integrity, skill, initiative, and good common sense.

Now he goes to the United Nations. He is the right man, at the right time, for that tough job.

At long last, and thanks to the steady pressure of the Reagan administration and the outstanding work of Ambassadors like Jeane Kirkpatrick and Vernon Walters, the United Nations is on the right track. But it still has a very long way to go on that track.

"America bashing," though somewhat reduced, remains the rule rather than the exception. "Israel bashing," often in virulent terms, remains the rule, almost without exception.

Despite improvements in its administration, inefficiency, and waste of money—a lot of it American taxpayers' money—are still all too common.

The treatment of subjects like human rights, though done in a somewhat more even-handed way than before, remains badly skewed; in effect, the United Nations through its investigations and reports has deemed that human rights violations of many Communist states are usually none of its business, while violations in many other countries are "fair game" for the most critical kinds of treatment.

The list could go on and on.

The United Nations is on the right track. It is doing some highly useful things—for example, through its reporting on events in Afghanistan, and some of its peackeeping operations.

But there is a long way to go.

Tom Pickering is the right Ambassador to keep the pressure on, for the United Nations to keep moving in the right direction, and hopefully at an accelerated pace. I am pleased to commend his nomination to the Senate, and I look forward to his unanimous confirmation.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I congratulate President Bush on his selection of Thomas R. Pickering as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and I am pleased to express my support and vote for confirmation today.

Thomas Pickering is well qualified for the position of U.N. Ambassador as reflected in his impressive list of accomplishments and experiences. A distinguished member of the Foreign Service since 1959, Thomas Pickering has served as Ambassador to Jordan, Nigeria, El Salvador, and most recently Israel.

His impressive career has included extensive work in the State Department as: Special Assistant to the Secretary of State and Executive Secretary, Deputy Director of the Bureau of Political-Military Affairs, and Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs.

Thomas Pickering is a 1984 and 1987 recipient of the Distinguished Presidential Award, and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, the International Institute of Strategic Studies, and the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. This appointment as U.N. Ambassador is consistent with his lifelong service to his country in the realm of foreign relations.

I came to know Tom Pickering personally when he was assigned as Ambassador to El Salvador. I visited him there in the early 1980's at a time of great turbulence in that country. He acquitted himself in that post with great distinction.

I also visited Ambassador Pickering during the time he was assigned to head the Embassy in Israel. Again, his performance was outstanding.

I support the nomination of Thomas Pickering to this post. If confirmed by the Senate, as I am sure he will be, I have every confidence that he will perform the new duties with exceptional skill, as he has other positions in the past.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, over 40 years ago, in the wake of the Second World War, the United Nations was formed. Like the League of Nations before it, the United Nations was based on a simple ideal: That the nations of the world should cooperate to prevent armed conflict and to promote harmony among mankind.

Unfortunately, for the last four and a half decades, the United Nations has, more often than not, served as an ideological battleground of the cold war. The U.N. Security Council has been the front line of the battleground, as the superpowers took turns denouncing the other in times of crisis. And who can forget the sight of Nikita Khrushchev banging his shoe on the podium at the U.N. General Assembly, warning of the impending Soviet domination of the world?

As we enter the 1990's, however, the United Nations is enjoying a revitalization, and is finally starting to play the role envisioned by the delegates in San Francisco—as an honest broker for peace. The U.N. Secretary General, Mr. Perez De Cuellar, has worked tirelessly to resolve many conflicts around the globe, and his efforts are finally bearing fruit. The blue helmets of the United Nations peacekeeping forces have become a welcome and familiar sight, monitoring recent cease-fire agreements in Southwest Asia, in the Middle East, and in Southern Africa. For this historic advancement of peace, the United Nations peacekeeping force deservedly received the 1988 Nobel Peace Prize.

Another encouraging development is that the superpowers are discovering that the United Nations can serve as a forum for solving global problems. Last fall, both President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev went to New York to sing the praises of the United Nations. Indeed, Mr. Gorbachev chose that moment to make a stunning offer for troop reductions in Europe as well as new cooperation on problems such as the environment and world debt.

The new U.S. Ambassador, therefore, will have an important task: helping to maintain the momentum in the United Nations for the resolution of conflict, and using the United Nations as an arena for discussion of global problems which do not recognize boundaries.

President Bush's designee, Thomas Pickering, is well suited to serve in this role. Ambassador Pickering is one of the finest officers in the Foreign Service, and his experience in a wide variety of posts abroad gives him a strong background to serve at the United Nations. His selection is a signal that the President—a former U.N. Ambassador himself—plans to give great weight to our effort at the United Nations.

However, our efforts there will be hampered unless we pay our debts. The United States is over $400 million in arrears to the United Nations; unless we make a good faith effort to pay this debt, our effective voice in that body will be diminished. Ambassador Pickering made a firm pledge to the Foreign Relations Committee that the administration is committed to paying our arrearages, and I look forward to working with him toward this end.

Mr. President, the United States is entering an exciting new era in foreign policy. Dramatic changes are occurring around the world that call into question many of the assumptions upon which American foreign policy has been based. Similarly, the United Nations has been resurrected from the dustbin of diplomacy, and is poised to enter a new golden age, in which the nations of the world may finally utilize its structures for settling conflict and for promoting global cooperation.

I am pleased to support the nomination of Tom Pickering to be Ambassador to the United Nations. I am confident that he will serve the country well as the United Nations enters this period, and I wish him every success as he takes up this new challenge.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am proud to vote today to confirm Ambassador Thomas Pickering, the President's nominee for the critical post of U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations.

I take pleasure in supporting this nomination.

Ambassador Pickering brings great knowledge and experience to the job. One of the stars of his generation in our career Foreign Service, Tom Pickering has served previously in high positions in Washington and as ambassador in Jordan, El Savador, and Israel. He possesses professional level fluency in French, Spanish, and Swahili. Throughout his long career he has won the respect of his colleagues, foreign leaders—such as King Hussein, who called him the best envoy our country has sent to Jordan—and Members of Congress.

I have to add that it is encouraging to see such a mature professional chosen to represent us at the United Nations at a time when that organizations is taking on a much greater role in international diplomacy and peacekeeping. We will need his tough and enlightened professionalism in New York in the next several years, and I salute the President and Secretary Baker for their solid good judgment in sending us this appointment.

Finally, Mr. President, voting for confirmation for this nominee allows us to make an important point about the confirmation process at this particular moment. Many bitter words have been exchanged over the course of the last few days about the inability of the executive and Congress to work together to dipose their constitutional responsibilities. But this confirmation—along with others the Senate has executed in foreign affairs—illustrates that cooperation is the rule rather than the exception in these matters. And, for this Senator, it will continue to be.

Mr. President, when the executive sends the Senate nominations for high office of this caliber, with this kind of experience, knowledge, and professionalism, it is a pleasure to vote for the President's nominee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has 1 minute.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HELMS. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on this nomination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, they have been.

Mr. PELL. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is, Will the Senator advise and consent to the nomination of Thomas R. Pickering to be Representative of the United States to the United Nations. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 99, nays 0, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Burdick

So the nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the motion to reconsider the vote is tabled, the President is immediately notified of the nomination, and the Senate will resume consideration on the Tower nomination.

NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, may we have order?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, point of order. The Senate is not in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. May we have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, many of whom have inquired about the schedule for the remainder of the day and the week, it is my intention to continue the debate on the Tower nomination through this evening. There may be votes should the distinguished Republican leader determine to proceed with the motion which he has previously indicated he is considering and has, of course, the option to do so at any time. Should that occur, there may be votes this evening.

It is my intention that the Senate will remain in session through this evening to continue the debate and continue all day tomorrow and on Thursday for so long as is necessary to permit that full debate to occur.

Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished manager of the nomination.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have a statement I would like to make tonight, but on the other hand, the Senator from Florida has been waiting over here for about 3 hours. So I would be glad to yield to him for his statement and then I will follow or whatever happens on the other side on recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Florida would mind yielding, and I ask consent that when I get through with my comments he be recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I ask consent for that. Would someone object to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, first let me thank the distinguished Senator from Florida. He has been waiting here for quite awhile, but he has been wonderfully courteous to allow me to speak because I have been compelled to speak out. In that light, let me commend the majority leader for his judicious and rigorously fair handling of this debate.

We have had 15 or 16 Bush appointments, confirmed by 99 votes on both sides. There might have been a dissent on the other side of the aisle, I think on a couple of these nominations.

But my point is that here we are trying our best to conscientiously consider a nomination. The administration urges us to review the FBI files, and when we take them up on it and come to a different conclusion, the administration says, "You are partisan. It is only innuendo. It is rumor." They can characterize, but we cannot describe.

I use words of description with caution. I tried to adhere to the rules, and I have.

But how else can you do it when they say "none," "not one," "not one iota," and then pursue a scorched earth strategy here on the floor. If you come out against John Tower, you are attacked politically on national TV. And I quote specifically from the Brinkley show of last Sunday.

Senator DOLE—

And I am quoting what he said on national TV—

what we don't need are these vicious personal attacks like we had from Senator Hollings from South Carolina. If we want to destroy the institution, then we go out and make vicious personal attacks. We are trying to preserve the institution, avoid criticism of each other.

Can you imagine that? "We are trying to avoid criticism of each other," but I am not. I must say he has gone over the line.

Mr. DONALDSON. May I ask what is the penalty for this? Are you going to try to censure him?

Senator DOLE. Oh, no, not that. What I mean, he has read from the report. He has alluded to the report. He had made vicious attacks on a former colleague, which is fine, I guess, if that is the way he wants to play.

I challenge and request respectfully that the distinguished Senator from Kansas substantiate that charge. Where has any statement of mine been vicious and where has it been an attack? These things have been personal with respect to Senator Tower's record. There is no question about that, and no avoiding that.

But point out to me the vicious attack I allegedly made in the RECORD. I would be delighted to respond to you as a man and a fellow Member of this particular body.

Mr. DOLE. I do not want to interfere with the time of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I do. I wanted to because I cannot appreciate this when you go and try to do a conscientious job and you get all involved. I happen to have stayed off that Brinkley show. I was invited to that show and many others. I declined all offers. But I have stayed off that TV because I did not seek a high profile in this debate. I had already announced to the media that all who had not made up their minds were being harassed. I described my conversations with Vice President QUAYLE, with the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Will Ball and with Mr. Fred McClure at the White House staff.

I told Senator NUNN that I had every intent of voting for John Tower until I studied the FBI record. The White House requested that we look at the record, and so I went over and looked at the record and went public with a conclusion, not an attack. I came down with the conclusion that I am not voting for Mr. Tower.

Where is the attack or vicious attack that would warrant an accusation on national TV, because you get unfairly characterized by such accusations? You are not allowed to maintain your integrity unless you agree with Mr. Tower's partisans.

I think therein, in all candor, is the attack on my integrity. There is a vicious attack on me personally when you do that kind of a thing.

Senator DOLE and I have been on the floor together for 20 years. We worked on the same side on many issues. But when you characterize my remarks as an attack on John Tower, that is wrong. John Tower made this record, not FRITZ HOLLINGS. I am sorry for him. I am trying to do the President the best favor ever done him.

I would love one thing. With names and confidential identities masked as appropriate, by all means let the White House make public the FBI reports.

This debate would be brought to a close within the hour. It would be all over. Let the White House call HOLLINGS' bluff.

I dare the President, on the one hand, to make the FBI reports public, or, on the other hand, let us go ahead and vote.

Let us give the President a vote on his nominee. I am trying to help the country, and I am interested in the national defense. As a practical matter, this fellow is totally useless with a majority of the Armed Services Committee against him. We are going to be trying his case from now on.

But, no, you folks insist, insist, insist. And I repeat my challenge to point to any instance in the RECORD where I have been vicious or have attacked the gentleman, when in truth, I have come down as best I can in a deliberate and cautious fashion.

I could see they are looking at the record. I will move on, if the Senator wants me to.

Mr. DOLE. Well, I want to quote the exact thing. "Mr. Alcohol Abuser."

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, I said only that he abuses alcohol.

Mr. DOLE. Is that not a vicious personal attack on a former colleague?

Mr. HOLLINGS. No, the record is he is an alcohol abuser.

Mr. DOLE. That is not the record. You know that is not the record.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Why do you not reveal the record? That is no personal attack. I have concluded that from the record. You say there is "not one iota" of evidence.

Mr. DOLE. You served with the Senator from Texas for a long time. You observed him. You were in an exchange the other day with the Senator from Wyoming and you said, "Drunk is enough for me."

And I have been on this floor when the Senator from South Carolina has attacked other Senators by name.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Oh, now, we have attacked other Senators. Let us stick to Mr. Tower.

Mr. DOLE. Let us recall each attack one at a time.

Mr. HOLLINGS. One at a time; namely, Tower.

Mr. DOLE. I recall a comment made about the Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM; and a comment about the Senator from Texas, "the Senator from Texaco." These are the words I recall the Senator from South Carolina saying.

When you stand on this floor and you talk about Mr. Alcohol Abuser, you are talking about John Tower. And there is no evidence in that record that he is an alcohol abuser.

Mr. HOLLINGS. There absolutely is, Mr. President, and he knows it.

Mr. DOLE. You would not speak to anybody else that way.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order, that Senators not address other Senators in the second person and that they make their questions through the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators should not address each other and should address their remarks through the Chair.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, with respect to Mr. Tower's alcohol abuse—and I will go down the different ones here, where they said "not one iota" and "all rumor" and "all innuendo" and then the gentleman brought up a 17-year-old case. I said on the floor that I would give you the odds. I repeat the offer. I have since been three additional times to review the FBI record. Not the record of 17 years ago, but I will show you facts, not rumors, of alcohol abuse within the last 6 years.

I said I will take at least 10 instances of abuse and show them to you. And all unrelated, I would add. That is what impressed me most. It was not just here, there, or a bunch in one particular place, but all unrelated. And I said, when you said "not one," I said I got 10 on the record. We are trying to adhere to the rules of the Senate. I said I will give you 10 in the last 6 years. Let the White House hush me up by revealing the record. Go ahead and sanitize it, take out the names—that is all we have to do, maintain the confidentiality of the individuals—but let's not sanitize the facts. Let us see whether my facts are true or your facts are true.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I would yield for a question or an answer to that question. In all fairness, I do not think anybody is going to call the rule on us.

Mr. DOLE. The comments of the Senator from West Virginia are correct and appropriate.

Mr. President, I would have to go back and check the record in the 20-some years I have been here, but I do not think I have ever made any reference to any other nominee or any colleague with some characterization.

I just happened to be on the floor when the comment was made about Senator Tower, being Mr. Alcohol Abuser. And I happened to be on the floor when there was a colloquy between, or a debate between, the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator from Wyoming knows precisely what was said. It no longer appears in the RECORD, I understand. But it was said on the floor with reference to Senator Tower. It was demeaning. It was a critical assault unwarranted on a former colleague, or anybody else for that matter.

There is no evidence, nobody has any proof, that John Tower is an alcohol abuser. But that was stated by the Senator from South Carolina as a fact. That was the reason for my statement.

I think John Tower is entitled to a little fairness in this body. We could all make spectacular statements. The Senator from South Carolina one day took about 10 words out of the FBI report—crocked, sloshed—and made a nice statement which got a big headline. Those words were taken out of the FBI report. He made reference to Senator Tower in that way without any proof, but simply taking someone's unverified statement.

Now, where is the fairness in all this, whether we are Republicans or Democrats? Who is going to be next? Maybe next time it will be a Democrat. Where is the fairness? Where is the press demanding rights for Senator Tower? What about due process? Has he had notice that there was going to be an attack by the Senator from South Carolina? Has he had a right to cross examine a witness? Has he had a fair and impartial tribunal? Where is the due process guaranteed by the Constitution?

I am not backing off from what I said. I never said anything to characterize anyone in this Senate or any nominee in all the time I have been here. There is such a thing as fairness. And when somebody wants to ride roughshod over a man who has given 24 years to this body, honorable service, honorable service to his country then I am going to defend him.

And if that offends the Senator from South Carolina, I regret it and I apologize.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I will say it again, because that is the record, alcohol abuser.

I noticed with interest, again on Sunday, incidentally, I say to the Senator from Kansas, that Mr. Tower while on the CBS' "Face the Nation" made a distinction between "excessive drinking" and "alcohol abuse." I fail to find that distinction. I do not find that distinction. Excessive drinking and alcohol abuse are one and the same. Let's not play on words.

I said here we have a standard in the military, and I read it in the RECORD and we will read it in again, both generally speaking with respect to a command or specifically speaking with respect to our nuclear weapons program. With respect to the general idea of alcohol abuse, it is read into the RECORD and I will refer to it. I said between the years 1984 and 1988, during that 5-year period, there were over 13,000 discipline cases and separation from the services on account of alcohol abuse. I said that is under the directive of the Secretary of Defense. I said how could I, in good conscience, discipline those people, separate them, put them out of the service for alcohol abuse and then appoint an alcohol abuser as the Secretary. I could not do it in good conscience.

That is what has us tied up on the FBI record. The White House can hush me in a second if they would only make it public. They can sanitize that record in 10 seconds. There is no national security question here.

And in this unusual case, since it has gotten here, we would just sanitize it. No confidences are breached, but the substance is there and the American public could make up its mind and this case would be over in an hour's time. That would end this particular confirmation.

Now, where does that put me? He calls that a vicious, personal attack. It is not a personal attack. It is a fact.

Yes, those words did appear. Now they do not appear in the Senate RECORD.

Incidentally, Senator, I notice you said in one question to the Parliamentarian, all on the same page of the RECORD, did we not do so and so and refer to it how many times. He said no, and then the next minute you said four witnesses. That appears right on page 2136 of the RECORD. "There are only four witnesses." You see, when you say how many witnesses, I have to say how many witnesses.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. I was talking about the public hearings. There were four witnesses.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Well, you meant the public hearings?

Mr. DOLE. Right. John Tower, Mr. Jackson, and Paul Weyrich, and there was someone else.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to permit me to pose a question to the Chair?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, I always yield to the leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it was my understanding that in response to a series of inquiries posed to the Chair that the Chair indicated that references to or use of information contained within the FBI files is not permitted at this time; am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would simply then caution all Senators that we are operating under extraordinary and very difficult circumstances. The President has made available to the Senate the file developed by the FBI in connection with this matter.

He has reasserted, in an explicit written document, that these files are the possession and the property of the executive branch and they are not to be used by the Senate except in accordance with the agreement under which they were transmitted.

The Chair has indicated that those cricumstances now preclude Senators from using information contained in those files in this debate. As recently as this afternoon, in response to a question, the President reaffirmed his position of not wishing these files to be made public.

This is very difficult for all concerned. It is very difficult for the President, exceedingly difficult for the nominee, and difficult for all here. But I ask that we honor our commitment to the President unless and until the President or the Senate makes a contrary determination and that we attempt, as best we can in these tense circumstances, to conduct the debate in the highest possible manner and consistent with our obligations to the President as they have been recorded in a specific document.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I will hasten along, I say to the Senator from Florida. I apologize to you, but we have to get this clear.

May I get the attention of the majority leader, please? I wish the majority leader, if we are going to do it and play by that rule, let us play by that rule for both sides. Because the leader has really sort of given me lockjaw.

There is Senator RUDMAN, "Not one iota, shred of evidence." That is his expression, "not one iota, shred of evidence," I will remind people that my name is linked with Rudman, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and I have the highest esteem and respect and affection for WARREN RUDMAN. But the Senator says, "Not one iota."; then you get, from a Senator I respect also, the Senator from Kansas hollering, "a vicious, personal attack." Then the Senator from New Hampshire comes on the floor and says, "not a shred of evidence, not one iota," and also a little later on, "Find any evidence," if you find "any evidence"—"any" is the word used.

You know, we lawyers, when you charge a jury, if there is any evidence, then it is a justifiable controversy and is referred to the jury. But the Senator says, "find any evidence." They do not know what they are reading. My colleague says, "Nothing." This is again Senator RUDMAN, "Nothing in John Tower's official conduct." Again, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire saying, "We are dealing here with fabricated, uncorroborated testimony."

When he characterizes it as not corroborated, I am not allowed to say that it is? When he says "no evidence," or "no times," am I able to say my number of times?

I want the leader to sit here and listen to this thing. Because we are being hounded for trying to do a conscientious job.

I left this thing alone. I went back to my office. Some of my staff had suggested I better get back. I said, no, I am not going to try John's case. I know what the score is. I have made up my mind because I can read and I am sorry. I think I am doing our natural defense and the President and the country the best job I can as Senator from South Carolina. And, if I get into it, it is going to be partisan. It is nonpartisan to me.

But then when they say all of these things here and I am not allowed, under the rule now—how do you respond? Other than pray for the President to please sanitize the record and let the record speak? Let the people decide.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I respond, if the Senator will yield?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, sir. What am I to do?

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to make clear that my remarks were not directed at the Senator from South Carolina. The fact of the matter is that several Senators have made statements which involve information in the report. Indeed, I specifically recollect that when the distinguished Republican leader posed the inquiries to the Chair and received the responses from the Chair, he stated that he had inadvertently made statements, including such information, without knowledge that they were prohibited under the rulings of the Chair—which of course had not been made.

Is my recollection correct?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. So, I want to make clear I am not directing my remarks to the Senator from South Carolina. I have tried to point out and I point out again that we are in a very difficult circumstance.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I know that. I am the one suffering from the difficulty.

I hear Senator RUDMAN. WARREN, I admire you greatly, but here is what you said, "Witnesses not cross examined, not subject to any other test."

You know I can tell you about one witness they tested pretty good.

Mr. RUDMAN. Will whoever has the floor yield for a quick question or comment?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. I will say to my friend, we are all operating under very labored circumstances and I tried very hard to make that point in some remarks I made just an hour ago. But let me make an observation as one who read rule XXIX, read its history, looked through the ethics files as to what it stands for and what it does not stand for. Maybe this will be some guidance.

I do not believe under rule XXIX that you can characterize testimony by quoting it. I do not think you can pull out words or descriptions. And I think other Senators have, and I am sure inadvertently, with no intention to violate the rule.

But I do believe that it is perfectly proper to state on this floor general characterizations of testimony in terms of the kind of testimony it is and most particularly I will say with all due respect to my friend that you certainly can say on this floor what is not in the FBI report. That you can say.

Anybody who wants to examine my remarks this afternoon will find that I assiduously follow the rule of only characterizing generally the kind of testimony, without mentioning name, place or even the type of allegation. And certainly when I referred to the fact that the evidence was not there to support certain conclusions I am entitled to say that.

Let me say to my friend from South Carolina, I do not think he has done violence to rule XXIX.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I appreciate the Senator from New Hampshire, and I appreciate his courtesy and understanding here.

The Senator says now, "Not one iota or shred of evidence," and I want to complete it, because I find lawyer talk here. "Not one shred of evidence or iota that he is impaired on the job."

Now, the lawyer talk is "on the job." I think those proposing the confirmation of Senator Tower are saying: "Tell me when you saw him drunk on the job."

I am using, yes, a different test. He himself has put himself to it. He has asked to be the Secretary of Defense.

Well, "on the job," on the base, on-duty hours and off-duty hours, with respect to orderly or disorderly conduct, with respect to alcohol or alcohol abuse, pertains. And this is particularly true of the job.

If he is seen late in the evening or off the job, as they say, not sitting as a negotiator, not sitting as a Senator—we did not see that. But I saw enough otherwise, where I would be embarrassed to have a Secretary of Defense in that condition. Not on the job. Let me just put it as briefly as I can. If my colleague sees the point I am making?

Mr. RUDMAN. I see the Senator's point. If he will yield for one moment, if my colleague wants to read the committee document that is before us, the committee document spends a good deal of time on setting up standards for the Secretary of Defense as they relate to other military officers in sensitive commands. And had the Senator heard my remarks earlier, he would have noted that I very carefully delineated that that military standard applies to the conduct of one's duties in about five specified areas.

I am not arguing with the Senator's conjecture carrying beyond that. He has every right. But I repeat what I said. There is not one iota, one shred, one scrap of evidence, even rank hearsay evidence, in this entire report that would indicate that the nominee at any time as a Senator, as an arms negotiator, as a commissioner, was observed by anyone impaired by the use of alcohol. That is all I said to my friend from South Carolina. That is not lawyer talk. That is plain talk.

If the Senator wants to impose a greater standard that is his privilege. That was a fair commentary on the evidence, and no one is able to rebut that.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FOWLER). The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was just going to say in response to that by my good friend, that is an opinion, pure opinion. That is not a fact as you have stated it.

Mr. RUDMAN. Does the majority leader indicate that I read that report and was able to read that entire report and not observe a fact that would have rebutted my presumption?

Mr. MITCHELL. I very strongly disagree with that description of what is in that report. You are perfectly entitled to you opinion. You are perfectly entitled to characterize it as you see fit. But it cannot be permitted to stand as though that were an undisputed fact. That is certainly what the debate is about, and people are able to draw their own judgment.

Mr. RUDMAN. The majority leader is entitled to his opinion. I would make an offer to any Senator on this floor to join me now, this minute to go up to room S-407. I will go through the report line by line with any Senator from either side of the aisle, trained lawyer, judge, investigator, whatever, read every line of that report and, Mr. Majority Leader, my dear friend from Maine, I stand on that statement because it is correct. Because one thing I learned in 24 years of praticing law is I know how to read evidence, and I know how to state it and I know how not to misstate it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I know how to do that just as well as you do.

Mr. RUDMAN. I am sure.

Mr. MITCHELL. And I think that we can read the same report and draw different conclusions, and we can characterize what is in the report in a different way, but opinion is not fact. It is a subjective judgment by each person making his or her own judgment. That is the point I think has to be made.

I have read the report, and I reach a sharply different conclusion as to what the Senator does. I have the greatest respect for the Senator's judgment, but that is my opinion. I do not present my opinion to the Senate as fact. I present it as opinion, which it is; subjective judgment.

Mr. RUDMAN. Do I understand the majority leader to say his opinion is the opposite of mine on that point?

Mr. MITCHELL. On the point that you made regarding——

Mr. RUDMAN. In other words, the majority leader is saying that from his reading of the evidence, and I greatly respect his ability to read, that the majority leader is saying that there is evidence in his mind that might reach the conclusion that the nominee was, in fact, observed impaired during the official conduct of his duty?

Mr. MITCHELL. You did not use those words when you just made the categorical statement.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thought I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, you did not.

Mr. RUDMAN. The majority leader can state what he thought I said.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are placing a qualification on your prior statement which did not exist in the prior statement. You said impaired, period. You ended the sentence there in your prior characterization.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. Majority Leader, I am not going to get into a long debate on this. I will state simply my reading of that record, and I think it is fair to comment within the purview of rule XXIX what is and—not what is in the report but what is not in the report. I come to the conclusion reading that report that I could find no evidence that indicated that the nominee was impaired by the use of alcohol during the conduct of his official duties. That is the full extent of my statement. If I stated it some other way, I did not intend to, but I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLE. The majority leader just touched on something. The Senator from South Carolina said this is a fact that he is a known alcohol abuser. That is not a fact. That is his opinion.

Mr. HOLLINGS. On the facts.

Mr. DOLE. There are no facts in the FBI file to support it, but that can be your opinion.

What I want to do is go back and check the cleaned-up RECORD against the video of floor proceedings before I respond fully to the Senator from South Carolina because I think the RECORD has been cleaned up a little since his strong words on the floor last week.

You may be having a lot of fun kicking our friend all over the place. He is our friend. We have known him for 24 years. It was not some stranger you were kicking around over there. He was a man we served in the Senate with. You may have gotten a lot of kicks out of saying "crocked," and all those words right out of the report, and then coming in and saying John Tower is a known alcohol abuser. That is an opinion, just as much as the majority leader gets a little testy because the Senator from New Hampshire has an opinion.

We are still trying to figure out some way to get this nominee confirmed, and I do not believe those kinds of statements about John Tower.

I say to my friend from South Carolina, I will be glad to discuss this with him privately, or maybe he wants to go out and make that statement when not protected by speaking from the Senate floor.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I have.

Mr. DOLE. Go out and call him in public an alcohol abuser.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I will. I will make talks all over South Carolina and justify my vote. I would be delighted to do so. Do not worry about that. If I can get the floor back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DOLE. That is an opinion. I think the majority leader will agree that is an opinion.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I am not changing my record right now. I am saying as a matter of record alcohol abuse, and I mean it because I have seen those words from different witnesses totally unrelated, all coming together, and I said just to bring it into focus so it is not back there where you are trying cases 17 years ago, back in the seventies and everything else, bring it right on up from 1983 right on up to today. Six—well, less than 7 years, right at 6 years. I will point out in the RECORD as fact that he was seen crocked, that he was seen comatose and all of those other words that we use, and I did use it off the floor. I have the record right here, a news conference, so I have stated that. I have the record to substantiate it.

Now, Mr. President, you get into this dancing around the bush, and I refer particularly to March 5, Sunday, the interview on "Face the Nation" with Leslie Stahl. On page 7, Ms. Stahl, to Senator Tower:

"You've admitted to alcohol abuse yourself."

"Senator Tower: I've admitted to excessive drinking in the 1970's."

"Ms. Stahl: Well, this says alcohol abuse. It doesn't say dependence. It says alcohol abuse."

"Senator Tower: What says alcohol abuse?"

"Ms. Stahl: The guideline in the military."

"Senator Tower: Yes, but I've said excessive drinking, not alcohol abuse. There's a difference."

And Ms. Stahl says: Oh, Senator, but pardon me; how are you doing? What in the world are we talking about here? I don't find that difference. I don't find that difference at all.

My friend from Florida has been more than generous and considerate of me. He has tried to clear this particular record. I have pointed to those times. I can go into other things, but I apologize for taking that much time. It is quite obvious to me when they say—just a minute ago—there is no fact to support that opinion. You can believe 1 witness against 12, or 12 witnesses against 1. The jury is allowed to do that and they are charged with the duty of doing that as to who are the credible witnesses.

I find a witness is credible, I find him corroborated, I find him categorical, and that is why I use those words, because they are pretty categorical when you say you are bombed and you are comatose. That tells me there is alcohol abuse. And when I look at the military generally, I know the gentleman could not serve in command. When I look at it specifically, having just been under the nuclear Navy, not just as an officer, but an enlisted man, since we are defending enlisted men, he could not serve on the crew of the U.S.S. Tennessee. I am being specific. I have just gotten off it last month. That gentleman, if he is not qualified in this man's mind to serve on the crew of the U.S.S. Tennessee, heavens above, do not ask me to confirm him as Secretary of Defense.

I yield the floor, by the unanimous consent agreement, back to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator from Florida yield 2 minutes? Again, I apologize.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. We have just had more expressions right out of the FBI file—not report—from the Senator from South Carolina, repeating words that have already been spoken on this floor. Maybe, according to the Chair's opinion, that is fair game, once they are in the public domain. But I just make the same plea I have made before. If we want to go and just assassinate somebody's character, we can do it right here on the floor and we can all be protected. It does not make any difference who it is but this happens to be someone we served with. Seventy-one of us are still here.

I would like to know what we are trying to do to John Tower. What has he ever done to us to deserve this kind of treatment, that he deserves these kinds of statements on the Senate floor? "Alcoholic abuser"? That may be someone's opinion but it is not supported by the evidence. And how far is it going to go if this debate gets bitter? So far it has been fairly tame. We are prepared to go the rest of this week and into next week because we want this nomination confirmed. We want to convince Senators on this floor that John Tower is qualified, that his fitness and competency has been determined by the President of the United States, and that there is no reason, at least no legitimate reason, not to vote for his confirmation.

Now, if you do not like John Tower, as I said, that is one thing. But I do not know why John Tower deserves outbursts from the Senator from South Carolina. I am going to work with the Senator from South Carolina to try to get some of this report released. As he said on the floor, "Just take 1 hour and it will all be over." I do not think so. In 1 hour, it might be over—we might be voting for confirmation. We are not going to sell John Tower short because we know him and the Senator from South Carolina knows him. He said on this floor, "I never saw the Senator from Texas, Senator Tower, inebriated."

And he served with him 21 years, or 24 years but he will take something out of some report, some unknown witness, some alias, and believe that. This cannot be explained unless, perhaps, one just does not want him to be Secretary of Defense. And I think we can do better than that in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I would like to make a couple of points in response to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Over and over again, we have heard the plea, "You served with Senator Tower. You never saw him inebriated. Why is not that evidence that he didn't have a problem?"

"During the time when Senator Tower and the White House were denying that he ever had a problem, that was a valid argument. But Senator Tower has now publicly acknowledged that he had a problem of excessive drinking through the 1970's. What does that say about the fact that several Senators have said, "I never saw him ever inebriated or under the influence of alcohol"? A person who has now publicly acknowledged repeatedly that he had a problem of excessive drinking during that period. Was the vision of all Senators impaired or was it not the reality that the problem simply did not manifest itself in circumstances that were observable by Senators in the normal course of their duties. Several Senators have described in great detail how they traveled with Senator Tower, how they attended late night sessions with him, how they attend conferences with him, all during the period which he now acknowledges he had a problem of excessive drinking.

Mr. DOLE. He never said problem. He never said he had a problem. He said——

Mr. MITCHELL. I believe he used the words "excessive drinking."

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. We say problem of excessive drinking.

Mr. DOLE. We could probably name others who had a problem with that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not disputing that. All I am saying is that the argument that you did not see him in this condition ought to be dispositive is completely undermined by the fact that he himself has acknowledged that—I do not know how to characterize it but to use his own word—he engaged in excessive drinking during that period. And finally, if I could just say——

Mr. DOLE. What does that tell us?

Mr. MITCHELL. It tells us that the fact that a single or several Senators did not see him in that condition is not and ought not to be dispositive of this question.

If I could just make one final point, there is one way to end this and that is to vote on the nomination. That is what the Constitution mandates us to do. That is what our obligation is. That is the only ultimate function that we have in this matter, and that is what we should do. Let us vote on the nomination. Let us bring it up, call it to a vote, call the roll and let Senators say how they vote on this. The longer we drag it out, the longer it is extended, the more likely we are to get involved in this kind of discussion, which I believe is not beneficial to anyone, surely not the Senate, surely not the individuals involved, surely not Senator Tower.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. If I could just finish. I have said previously I would like to see us vote on this as soon as possible. I now ask my colleagues, why not a vote tomorrow? Why not a vote Thursday? Why will not the proponents of the nomination, who want to see him confirmed, agree to permit a vote so we can dispose of this matter, up or down, one way or the other, as we are supposed to do. That is the only way this is going to end, the only way.

Mr. DOLE. I do not quarrel with the majority leader about voting, but there was a series of leaks that almost buried Senator Tower. They were all bad. Nobody complained about them when they were bad. Then the White House put out a couple of positive leaks, and "oh, we are going to have more hearings if we don't stop these leaks." Nobody said a word about all the bad leaks and all the rumors and innuendoes. So, of course, public opinion, when you took a poll, was 3 to 1 against Tower. But now it is beginning to change. People are beginning to understand that John Tower is being hurt by leaks and innuendoes. This man has not been dealt with fairly. He has not had due process. We are still trying to convince some undecided Senators to take a look at the fairness issue, to take a look at his qualifications, and then we are going to vote. We are going to vote, but we are going to make a case because this nomination may set a precedent that we do not think, if it defeats John Tower, should ever be followed again, for any nominee, Republican or Democrat. We have had a solid 4 days of debate, and there are a lot of Members on each side who still want to get into it. When we start dragging our feet and putting in a lot of quorum calls, then we can be accused of delay.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield just 1 minute?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield.

Mr. HOLLINGS. When the Senator from Kansas uses the word "outbursts" as he did—the RECORD will show it—"outbursts from the Senator from South Carolina," you see that is the kind of characterization that I resent and resist. When he says, when I comment on the fact in the RECORD, it is a vicious attack, I resent and resist that. And what you are having here is the character of the Senator is being assassinated on account of the determination politically—it cannot be otherwise motivated—on the minority side. There is no question in my mind SAM NUNN wanted him as Secretary of Defense, recommended him to the FBI, but had to change his mind. FRITZ HOLLINGS of South Carolina wanted him to be Secretary of Defense. I made talks during the Christmas period because there was doubt in the President's mind, and I used the same approach about the capability, and I knew he knew the budget and those kinds of things. But when I saw the record, I came down with a different conclusion.

So don't talk about outburst and vicious attacks and we are assassinating Tower. Tower and that crowd is assassinating the Senate, demeaning this body with this kind of stretch out and characterization and innuendo and rumor when we know it is fact in that record.

I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator from Florida yield for 1 minute. I promise it will not be any longer that that.

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, we had a dialog earlier this morning about the investigative subcommittee checking out allegations that had come to us on the Armed Services Committee.

I mentioned this morning that I had informed both the Republican leader on the Armed Services Committee as well as the Republican leader on the Governmental Affairs Committee, Senator WARNER and Senator ROTH, as well as Senator GLENN, that this procedure was being undertaken and did not start until Sunday. We have now been informed that the White House has basically taken a different position than what I understood they took last week, and that is that the FBI, when we do have legitimate allegations, will now check them out.

Last week I was informed that the FBI had been taken off this case. Now we are informed, and I talked to Mr. Gray myself, that they will undergo a legitimate inquiry on the matters that the committee requests.

We are still going to screen them. We have several allegations, and we are trying to screen them; we are trying to make sure we do not send anything down that is not, at least on its face, legitimate inquiry. As I have said over and over again, we have had something like 60 different allegations come before our committee. Out of these 60, we have now sent down to the FBI approximately 10. The rest of them, we have felt, did not deserve attention and have been dropped. So we have gone back to the regular procedure. I have talked to Senator WARNER about this, and we have consulted.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

Mr. NUNN. I do not have the floor. I thank the Senator from Florida for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must insist, only because of the number seeking recognition, that the rules be followed, that any request to speak or yield be directed through the Chair.

I will remind Senators that the Senator from Florida [Mr. GRAHAM] has the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Florida will allow me just for a minute or two to address the statements by the distinguished chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WARNER. The chairman and I had a colloquy this morning about what transpired since Thursday night when the chairman and I ceased to work, and not in an unfriendly way, but pragmatically, recognized that he was going to go one way and I another. So at that point, the respective staffs of the Armed Services Committee were responsible solely to the majority, to the chairman, to the minority, to myself, and other members of the committee, like my distinguished colleague from Arizona, who worked with the staff, I think, Thursday and Friday on some other matters.

I was not aware that the FBI at any time had indicated that they were no longer, except by way of reference from anyone in the Senate, not necessarily the Senate Armed Services Committee, to be involved with this new information. Am I not correct on that, I ask the chairman?

Mr. NUNN. I believe that is correct. Until Sunday morning. I believe I did inform the Senator from Virginia of that Sunday morning.

Mr. WARNER. Sunday morning was the first time.

Mr. NUNN. I am not sure of the day I was informed of that. It was either Thursday or Friday of last week, and I cannot tell the Senator which day I was informed. He and I did not discuss it until Sunday morning.

Mr. WARNER. During the Sunday morning discussion, it was our hope to get together early Monday morning, but the chairman was precluded from returning to Washington because of the weather.

Mr. NUNN. Monday afternoon.

Mr. WARNER. While I have the chairman and the attention of the leadership, the Armed Services Committee has not sent to the floor its recommendation that this nominee not be accepted by the Senate. My understanding is that our committee no longer has jurisdiction. When the distinguished chairman says we should check this out or that, could he explain who the "we" is and how we go about settling this, because I more or less had indicated to my leader that the matter was in his hands now, together with the majority leader.

Mr. NUNN. I believe the Senator makes a good point here. This is not a matter of the Armed Services Committee any more. However, we have been involved all along. We are the ones to whom the allegations come, not to the majority or minority leader.

So we have, I think, a duty to be guided by the Senate itself in this matter, and I believe that we both will accept that. If the majority leader and minority leader decide they would like us to continue to work in this vein, that is fine with me. If they decide they ought to make the decision about which allegations go down or do not go down to the FBI, that is also fine with me. So it is a matter for the Senate to determine.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the distinguished chairman. Any future involvement by the Senator from Virginia would be at the direction of the Republican leader and those members of the committee. At this point in time, I am just learning of the fact that there are new allegations.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the distinguished Senator from Florida yield for a further question on this issue, so we can put it to rest, as to what procedures are being used?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I ask the distinguished chairman if this means there will no longer be further investigations by the staff of his subcommittee into allegations that have been sent to the U.S. Senate, or will that practice continue without this member, at least, being informed of what was going on?

Mr. NUNN. Well, I say to the Senator that if the FBI is back in business, we will not need to have any investigative team out there from the Armed Services Committee or the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee. We never had Armed Services people doing investigations. What we have had them doing is preliminary screening, and I think that preliminary screening should continue, but that, again, will be the question of the majority and minority leaders. By preliminary screening, I am not taking allegations that should not ever be brought to the attention of the FBI, should not take up their time and analyzing them enough, making a phone call or two to determine whether they ought to be put in the bottom drawer. We put about 50 of them in the bottom drawer.

I say to the Senator that we would plan, depending on the guidance we get from the leadership. I want to do whatever the Senate would like to do on that.

Mr. McCAIN. Am I to interpret the response of the distinguished chairman that the Government Operations Subcommittee, which he chairs, will no longer have their staff out investigating allegations?

Mr. NUNN. The Senator is correct on that. We have no plans or no need for that. It was only because I was informed that the FBI had been pulled off this matter that that need ever came up.

I have to say this: Over and over again, there has been frustration about the fact that the evidence in this case is up in S-407. When you bring an allegation to the FBI, it is going to go back to 407. It is not going to be public on the floor. It is not going to be something the public will know about. That is the impediment of dealing with the FBI that we all have to understand. I understand we are being encouraged to move in that direction by that side of the aisle. That has been the procedure we followed all along. I do not think people ought to complain, though, that something comes back in S-407, and we cannot talk about it on the floor.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the chairman also be good enough to tell this Member who informed him that the FBI would no longer be involved?

Mr. NUNN. I could give you the name later. I do not recall the name right now. It was last week in a conversation. It was the people who were directly involved in the investigating team down at the FBI. I will be glad to furnish that later.

Mr. McCAIN. I am astonished that the person whose name the Senator cannot remember, would provide him with that information, rather than get corroboration with the White House and a number of people that would be available to provide that information.

I am glad that the unfair, incredible, and unprecedented practice of using a committee that has nothing to do with the nomination of the Secretary of Defense is no longer part of this operation. I am glad to know that.

I thank my friend from Florida for allowing me this opportunity to clarify the procedures that are going to be used in the future.

Mr. NUNN. I wish to respond to the last comment.

First of all, Mr. Gray did tell the FBI and, in fact, he mentioned to me today on the telephone, that he told the FBI that they were not involved in this matter anymore.

Now, it is true that we did not ask them to check into an allegation, and they turned it down. We did not have that allegation when we talked. It does not matter who the FBI agent is. I can get that for him in a few minutes, but it matters that the White House acknowledges that themselves. He can check and find out.

Also, I would add that this is not unprecedented. This is the best subcommittee investigative team in the Senate. We have loaned our people to other committees time after time after time, for various inquiries. We continue to do that. That is a matter of discretion with the chairman and ranking member.

It is a normal procedure when we do it, and that is done by the minority, too. I also say, and Senator ROTH will verify this, that the minority starts off on preliminary inquiries all the time without basically having to get the consent of the whole committee. We just have a dialog between the chairman and ranking member.

I will be glad to yield.

Mr. McCAIN. I would be glad to check out the history of the situation. But I do not believe, according to the information I have, that the majority staff has been used to conduct an investigation and no investigation has been conducted by a committee that has nothing to do with any oversight of the candidacy or nominee for any office, other than that under the direct supervision of that committee.

Mr. NUNN. I have been the chairman of that subcommittee now for several years, and I was vice chairman for years before that when Senator Jackson headed it up. I have been on it for 16 years. There are numerous occasions that the majority staff has moved out on a preliminary inquiry itself. There are numerous occasions where the minority staff has moved out on a preliminary inquiry by themselves.

Mr. McCAIN. On a nominee?

Mr. NUNN. This happened over and over again.

This is an unprecedented situation here. The whole nomination we are in is unprecedented. If I thought it was going to be the pattern in the future, I think all of us would have a second thought about serving in this body.

This is the exception. It is unique.

I yield.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I realize the large gathering of colleagues and the audience is here to hear the remarks that I prepared for delivery.

I am going to yield to one more Senator before I fulfill their expectation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine, Mr. COHEN.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Senator from Florida for his Job-like patience under the circumstances.

The Senator from Georgia raises a good point when he said that all the information that comes from the FBI goes up to room S-407.

One of the concerns that I have had frankly is where does the information go that is conducted by the preliminary inquiry or preliminary investigation through the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. Under what guidelines do they operate? Who has the body of information that is accumulated by the committee? Does it go to Armed Services? Does it come to the Governmental Affairs Committee? Does it come before the Senate?

What are the rules of confidentiality? Are those to be disclosed to the public in debate before the Chamber? What are the rights of Senator Tower to be notified such as interviews the FBI conducts when they have their examination? What are his rights in confronting witnesses?

I think all of those questions were of serious concern to us when we really did not know about it other than through a report today.

So I think that is the reason for the concern as to who is in charge, under what circumstances, what are the guidelines, and what is the process going to be?

Mr. NUNN. I would say to the Senator it is now really a moot question because the FBI being back in the business the total report that we get will be from the FBI so there will not be any report from the investigating subcommittee.

It was my thought all along that they were working under the Armed Service Committee and would go back through our regular procedure so that it would be handled just like an executive session or anything else. They wanted it to be confidential, the particular witnesses; if they wanted it to be public, then that would be another matter, and we would have to get the committee together to decide that, but it is now a moot question because we are going to go back to the regular procedure under the guidance of the majority and minority leaders and the Senate itself.

I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the Senator from Florida yield for one final question?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania but I would even more like to give my relatively brief and I think contributory statement at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CONRAD). The Senator from Florida.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, this week we are celebrating the 200th anniversary of the first convening of the U.S. Senate. It was no doubt a session that was surrounded with excitement, the turmoil, the lack of precision of any new institution in its first days. It must have been sufficiently in tumult that it was unable to secure a quorum until almost 6 weeks after that first session.

But in the 200 years since that first session this Chamber has witnessed many hours like the one that we have just participated in. They are hours which are dominated by the fact that this is a very human institution. We are all men and women who bring to this Chamber our backgrounds, our own experience, our own views of life.

We have just heard an extraordinary series of exchanges. I believe that the time has come to bring this issue to a conclusion for the benefit of the Nation, and I believe that the most significant way in which we can accomplish that objective is by individually arriving and announcing our judgments on this matter.

At such time as a majority of the Members of this body have indicated their intention the issue will be resolved, and it will then just be a matter of taking the formal vote in order to solemnize the conclusion that we have individually reached.

To contribute, therefore, to that objective which I think would be so much in the Nation's interest, I announce that it is my intention to vote against the confirmation of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The argument has been made that the President of the United States should be able to seat, establish, to name his own Cabinet.

As a former chief executive, I support the principle of a strong presumption regarding the President's Cabinet selections.

Like many of my colleagues, I began my analysis of this Presidential nomination with a presumption of correctness.

But, the Chief Executive's right of appointment is not absolute.

The Founding Fathers did not intend the appointment process to be absolute.

Rather, it was to be shared, and they encompassed this concept of a shared responsibility with the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate.

If we were to automatically accept nominations of the President, without the serious attention which this debate indicates we are in fact giving to that nomination, we would render the advice and consent function a nullity.

The nominee before us now, Mr. John Tower, a former Member of this body who has reviewed many Presidential nominations, shares this view that I have just expressed.

On two occasions as U.S. Senator, John Tower did not support the President's nomination: Once for a Secretary of Labor, and once for an arms-control negotiator.

I am confident that Senator Tower made those judgments in good faith, and that his patriotism was not questioned because he exercised his responsibility as a Senator to give advice and consent on those Presidential nominations.

Mr. President, before us today is the nomination for the Secretary of Defense—one of the most vital positions in our Government and chain of command, of our Nation's security.

In addition to the high standards which we would apply to all Cabinet appointments, we must examine two additional criteria regarding the Secretary of Defense:

First, the Defense Secretary is a role model. Leadership by example is an essential element of our military tradition and our future military success.

Second, the Defense Secretary, to a degree unknown to other Cabinet officers, has operational responsibilities in time of crisis.

Many Americans have recently reviewed the events of 25 years ago when we came closest in our postwar history to nuclear confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union. We can all recall the scenes of the then Secretary of Defense, Robert McNamara, as he dealt in an extremely crisis-laden atmosphere with the most delicate judgments that were necessary in order to both preserve our Nation's security but move the world away from destruction.

When I examined these two criteria—leadership by example and the vital operational responsibilities—I found I could not support the nomination of John Tower for Secretary of Defense, because I found a pattern of questionable judgment in the seventies and in this decade that eroded the presumption which I give the correctness of a Presidential nomination.

Restricting myself in these comments to those things that are on the public record, we have a pattern of bad judgment during the 1970's in excessive use of alcohol. In this decade we have bad judgment in accepting large sums from the defense industry, the very industry that he had previously been legislating about, previously as arms negotiator has been making decisions which would affect in the most fundamental way its future, and now as Secretary of Defense would be dealing with in terms of a private-public relationship for our national security.

Mr. President, my concern about this nomination was heightened during the middle of last month after I spent a day working with the young sailors at the Jacksonville Naval Air Station. These sailors, some of them just out of high school, had a very clear understanding of our military's policy against drug and alcohol abuse. These youngest members of the Navy who represented the full diversity of our Nation, male and female, black and white, names from Rodriguez to Weaver to Albertson, to the full nationality, these youngest members of the Navy can state without equivocation the rules of the military.

The youngest sailors on the docks or in the hangars at Jacksonville knew that our military has no tolerance for substance abuse. Sanctions for violations are strict, as they should be. Those who cannot meet the standards are dismissed from the military. Strict enforcement of those standards has achieved a marked reduction in substance abuse.

Mr. President, I am concerned that the nominee for the top defense position in this Nation has in the past set a personal standard that is less than the standards the military has set for its youngest sailors, soldiers, and airmen. Therefore, I am prepared to vote against this nomination and ask that the President move quickly to submit another nominee so that we can get on with the vital business of defending America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a news clipping from the Washington Post of February 7 on the progress which the U.S. military has made in restraining substance abuse among members of the military.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DRUG USE IN MILITARY DECLINES SHARPLY

The illicit use of drugs in the U.S. armed forces has declined even more than expected, the Pentagon said yesterday.

Use of marijuana declined from 6.5 percent in 1985 to 2.9 percent last year, while use of other illicit drugs dropped from 5.8 percent in 1985 to 3.1 percent in 1988, the Defense Department said in a statement.

The overall figure for the use of any drug dropped from 9 percent in 1985 to 4.8 percent in 1988, the Pentagon said.

Cigarette smoking and heavy alcohol use also declined, and the survey "found that almost 80 percent of military personnel took some action within the past year to improve their nutrition," the Pentagon added.

The 1988 survey is the fourth conducted since 1980, when the Pentagon began attacking a drug problem within the ranks that was almost out of control. That year, more than a quarter of all military personnel—27.6 percent—admitted using drugs.

The Pentagon responded with tougher disciplinary sanctions, including dismissal from the service and random urine testing.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to commend the Senator from Florida for a very fine statement and say that it was certainly worth staying through the previous exchange in order to hear it. I am very grateful that the Senator from Florida remained patient in order to deliver his statement.

I particularly want to underscore one thing the Senator said. I think there are unique responsibilities that the Secretary of Defense has, given that he is in the chain of command, the national command authority.

The Secretary of one of the other Departments can make a decision this evening. He can go to the office tomorrow morning in the cold light of day and reverse the decision. The Secretary of Interior could decide to permit drilling in Yellowstone National Park, realize the next day that is a not a very wise decision, and pull it back and nothing will have happened.

The Secretary of Defense, unlike most other Cabinet officials, makes decisions that are not retrievable. They cannot be. They are irreversible, once made. Shortly thereafter, action may flow from the decision and the Nation has to live with its consequences.

I think a particularly important point in considering a nominee for this office is the nature of the role of the Secretary of Defense, as others have referred, as virtually the deputy commander in chief of our Nation and the fact that, as such, he will be called upon to make decisions which, once made, are not reversible. They cannot, the following day, be recalled and the consequences obviated.

I thank the Senator for his very strong statement.

Mr. DODD and Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair. I shall be very brief, I might say to my friend from Connecticut.

This relates to my effort to propound a question to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. I hoped that he would be present. I would like to make a very short statement about the procedures which we had discussed earlier today regarding the investigation by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

Mr. President, I remain concerned about the investigation initiated by that subcommittee and some of the later statements by the chairman of that subcommittee, who is also the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, with respect to the possibility that that subcommittee might be reactivated if it meets with the approval of the leadership. If that includes the Republican leadership, which I conclude that it does, then the reality is that it will not be reinitiated.

It seems to this Senator that an investigation by that subcommittee is inappropriate and outside of the rules of the Senate. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Governmental Affairs is specified in rule XXV(k)(1). I shall not read all of the jurisdiction of the committee, but will only note that it does not include any matter related to the issue, in any conceivable form, on the nomination of Senator Tower.

In addition rule XXVI provides that each such committee may make investigations into any matter within its jurisdiction. So that while there may be precedents for that subcommittee conducting other investigations, it seems to this Senator that those precedents fall in the face of the specific provisions of these rules.

When we recently passed Senate Resolution 66, Mr. President, in the 101st Congress, there was a direct reference again to expenditure of funds only in accordance with the provisions of rule XXV and rule XXVI.

There are subcommittee rules, Mr. President, which further impede this kind of inquiry, in my opinion, because the subcommittee rules permit investigations only with the approval of the chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking minority member. That same rule permits preliminary inquiries upon the approval of the chairman and notice to the ranking member.

I believe that it is reasonably clear that sending investigators to Texas does not consitute a preliminary inquiry but, in fact, does constitute an investigation. So that it would be necessary that there be the approval of the ranking member as well as the chairman.

When the chairman of the subcommittee, who is also the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, had commented earlier this morning, he noted on the RECORD that he had notified the ranking member, Senator ROTH, but did not say that he had sought approval. I have since talked to Senator ROTH, who states that he was notified, but he did not give his approval. He was not asked for his approval and did not give his approval.

Senator ROTH did say to this Senator that he personally does not regard the action of Senator NUNN as being in violation of the rule because of the informal procedures that they work under. Senator ROTH raised with this Senator the interpretation that what was done could fall under the preliminary inquiry provision of this rule. Senator ROTH concludes that that is a fair interpretation.

I disagree with that, and I believe that a fair reading of this rule would specify that sending investigators to Texas constitutes an investigation. I am undertaking some additional analogous research on this issue. But I believe, on the face of this subcommittee rule, that this was an investigation and, as such, required the affirmative approval of the ranking member, which was not obtained.

Whatever may be the import of the subcommittee rule, however, Mr. President, I think it is plain that under the Standing Rules of the Senate, XXV and XXVI, that the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations does not have the jurisdiction to undertake such an investigation. I would hope that following this incident, which has caused some substantial consternation in this Chamber, that there would be a further inquiry and analysis by that subcommittee as to the appropriate scope of its investigations.

I thank my colleague from Connecticut. I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, it is with a sense of sadness that I rise to speak on the nomination of John Tower to be our Secretary of Defense. I say sadness, Mr. President, not just because of what this debate may do to the reputation of the nominee—much of which, I might add, he has brought on himself—nor because of what this debate may do to the effectiveness of this new President to lead our Nation. John Tower and George Bush will survive.

What saddens me, Mr. President, is that at the very moment we gather to celebrate this institution's 200th year of uninterrupted contribution to the building of a great nation, we find ourselves locked in a pitiful 2-week debate over the personal conduct of a potential Cabinet member.

I do not minimize, Mr. President, the importance of the matter before us. But I am saddened when I take note that during my more than 8 years of service in the Senate we have not spent anything approaching the time spent on this question debating the economic, health care, or housing crises that threaten our Nation's security.

If on occasion we would examine the threat of nuclear war, the plight of the impoverished children, the deterioration of our environment, the burden of our staggering national debt, and the nightmares of homelessness and AIDS with the same intensity and attention to detail we have focused on this matter these past 2 weeks, I would fear less for the future of our country.

Rather than occupy the Senate's time debating the great issues of our day, we seem to many average Americans preoccupied with ourselves.

I suspect that at the conclusion of this fiasco various tallies will be offered identifying winners and losers. I will predict, regretfully and sadly, that in the eyes of most Americans this debate has produced no winners.

Saddened though I may be, Mr. President, the Constitution requires that this Senate decide and each Member vote on the matter before us. I would urge that we move to that vote quickly; further delay is in no one's interest, not the President's, not the Senate's, and assuredly not the public's.

Prior to stating my own conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to make some brief comments.

The question before us is a simple one: Should John Tower be confirmed as our Secretary of Defense?

The issue is not the members of the Armed Services Committee, the leadership of the Senate, or any other individual Members of this body. To those who defend John Tower or support his nomination by raising questions about the integrity or honesty of their colleagues, I say: Shame. You not only do a disservice to the nominee, you discredit yourself as a U.S. Senator and you undermine this institution and its constitutional role of advise and consent on Presidential nominations.

The majority leader has stated and restated that this decision is a personal one which each Member must make on his or her own. I agree. Reasonable and honorable Senators have reached and will reach different conclusions.

What would have been a little noted and long forgotten footnote to history has heightened the personal dimensions of my vote. Twenty-two years ago John Tower was one of five Senators to vote against the censure of my father.

I and my family will be eternally grateful to John Tower for that decison. Not surprisingly, I believe he cast the right vote.

Mr. President, I owe John Tower; I owe John Tower the same fairness and careful judgment he used 22 years ago. I do not owe John Tower my vote.

As in the case of my colleagues, I have spent many hours reading the various files, transcripts, and news accounts regarding John Tower's nomination. I have spoken with many of you, my colleagues, and our former colleagues. I have consulted with friends in the military, in the defense industry, in the legal and academic communities. I have listened to the veterans' organizations in my State, and the phone calls and letters to my office. Now the hour has arrived to make a decision.

In weighing the nomination of John Tower as Secretary of Defense, the burden of proof rests not on the President, but on those who would deny the President his choice. The question is not whether John Tower would be my choice for Secretary of Defense, or whether he is the best man in America for this difficult and important job, but whether—by reason of inexperience or inexcusable behavior—he is unqualified to carry out the responsibilities the President wishes to invest in him.

I respect John Tower's knowledge of defense issues and his commitment to public service. However, on key issues of policy, I have respectfully disagreed with him. For reasons that have more to do with defense positions he advocated as a Member of this body than any of the factors that have been raised in the current debate, John Tower would not be my choice for Secretary of Defense, were it my choice to make.

John Tower's capabilities and knowledge of defense and national security matters have not raised a single note of disagreement. John Tower is a recognized expert in matters relating to nuclear deterrence, the deployment of conventional forces, and the costs and strengths of the various weapons programs. If his nomination were to be decided on this issue alone, he would have been confirmed weeks ago.

The charges against the nominee are that he has been indiscreet and even more offensive in his personal conduct—his sometimes heavy drinking and his relations with women—and that he displayed poor judgment, and perhaps even compromised national security, when he established a lucrative defense consulting business immediately after stepping down as U.S. Ambassador to the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks in Geneva. Either set of charges, if proven, would be sufficiently damning to disqualify a nominee from so sensitive a position as Defense Secretary.

For every account of indiscreet behavior in the FBI files I have examined on this nominee, there are other accounts—at least as reliable, in some cases far more reliable—that tell a different, and steadier tale. There are people who claim to have seen John Tower in compromising positions who, on cross-checking, don't appear to have been in the same room, or even in the same city, as the nominee.

And there is other evidence on John Tower: it is in the memory of those of us who served beside him during part or all of his 24 years in the Senate, and of those who worked beside him in Geneva or on the Commission he chaired on the Iran-Contra inquiry. No one who has watched and worked with John Tower throughout his career in Government has stepped forward to accuse him of misconduct or impaired judgment, or to corroborate any of the allegations of misconduct that have appeared in the press.

I do not in any way mean to minimize the fact that John Tower drank excessively during the 1970's, as he himself has acknowledged. It has been suggested here in recent days that confirming a nominee with such a history will send a message to our men and women in uniform that excessive drinking is forgivable. That argument has some merit. However, I would caution that in our determination to send one message, we not also send another—a negative one. I am just as concerned that we not send a message of rebuke and condemnation to those who acknowledge a past drinking problem, correct it, and make a commitment to lead a better life.

Mr. President, from my reading of the FBI and committee materials, I find the proof is simply not there to deny John Tower this nomination on the charges relating to his personal conduct.

In arriving at this conclusion, I recall the words of William Butler Yeats in his poem, "The People":

The daily spite of this unmannerly town,
Where who has served the most is most defamed,
The reputation of his lifetime lost
Between the night and morning.

The conflict of interest question that relates to this nominee is another matter. It is really two questions:

Did John Tower compromise national security in his post-START consulting work, offering confidential information on negotiating positions and fallback positions to contractors who could profit from such knowledge? Mr. President, there is no testimony, evidence or even allegation that he did.

Should John Tower be disqualified from serving as Secretary of Defense because he profited in the private sector from his status and experience in the public sector? According to the evidence, John Tower has done nothing that dozens of other former administration officials and Members of Congress have not done for years: hung out a shingle and sought to capitalize on his name and reputation. I do not like the practice. I have sponsored legislation that would stop the revolving door, and I hope the current debate will prod my colleagues to revive proposals that would bar high officials in the executive and legislative branches from immediately profiting from their Government service—and I hope the President, unlike his predecessor, will see fit to sign such legislation.

Mr. President, we cannot hold John Tower to rules that have not yet been made. We cannot argue that there ought to be a law prohibiting John Tower from doing what he did, and hold him to account, until we pass such a law. That strikes me as unfair.

In fairness, Mr. President, I have weighed the facts, and I have come to the belief that John Tower is qualified to serve as Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SARBANES). The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I rise today to announce my decision on the nomination of Senator John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. I must say I share the same sense of sadness as my colleague from Connecticut. As the Senate is bogged down day after day in debate on this issue, I am saddened because I see a different set of priorities for our country. I believe we ought to be taking the valuable time of this body to debate the question of the economic vulnerability of our country. But instead, Mr. President, we must first dispose of the matter of the nomination of Senator John Tower.

This week, like many of my fellow Senators, I have spent considerable time reading the FBI reports, the summary of material on Senator Tower, as well as both the minority and the majority views of the members of the committee. Mr. President, I have formed the conclusion that Mr. Tower should not be confirmed as Secretary of Defense. I have formed that conclusion because I believe firmly and sincerely that there is a pattern of excessive drinking that extends not only through the 1970's, but on into the 1980's as well.

Mr. President, when I started this process, I hoped that I would be able to support the nomination of Senator Tower. I have supported each and every one of the nominations that this President has sent to this body. Each and every time this Senator has voted in favor of the nominations of this President without exception.

Mr. President, on this occasion, this Senator will vote no. Some say we owe it to the President to endorse his nomination. I believe that we owe this President every consideration, but I also believe that our Founding Fathers felt that this body ought to have a review, and in exceptional circumstances, exercise our judgment to prevent a mistake from being made for this country.

Mr. President, I have watched Senator NUNN day after day go through this process. Senator NUNN has the office next to mine. Day after day, I hae traveled to the Senate in the subway or walked the halls with him, and day after day, I have watched him agonize. He was not agonizing for his party. He was not agonizing about his political future. He was agonizing about his country. He was agonizing because Senator NUNN was convinced this nominee had a serious problem. And let us be blunt; that problem was excessive drinking, pure and simple.

Now what is the evidence? This nominee himself acknowledges now that he had a problem of excessive drinking in the 1970's. The White House confirms it. The record is clear. I watched him on "Face the Nation." I watched him say he drank excessively in the 1970's, and then he said, but he did not abuse alcohol.

Mr. President, this is not just a matter of words. This is a matter of putting a person in the line of command, in the chain of command of the forces of the United States. Some would say we are using a double standard. Mr. President, a double standard is when you have two standards for the same job. This is a different standard for a different job. Secretary of Defense is not like being a U.S. Senator. No Senator can put our nuclear forces on alert. No Senator can send our bombers on the way to the Soviet Union. The Secretary of Defense can do that and, yes, there is a different standard. There should be a different standard.

Mr. President, we have heard repeatedly colleagues who served with Senator Tower say, "I have never seen John Tower inebriated." I respect those statements. I believe those observations. But no one could reach the conclusion from those statements that Senator Tower did not have or does not have a serious drinking problem. Again, I point to his own words, his own acknowledgment of a serious drinking problem.

Let us be frank. This is not a man who drinks a glass of wine too much. This is not a man who has a couple of beers too much. This is a man who the record shows when he ties one on, drinks so much that he is out of control, that he can barely walk, that he is not in a state that would allow him to discharge the awesome responsibility of the Secretary of Defense of the United States.

I think the record is clear, Mr. President, on the question of the 1970's, and friendship, partisanship, brinksmanship should not cloud our logic or our judgment on that question. We must ask ourselves, did this pattern of excessive drinking end in the 1970's? I believe the record is clear. The problem did not end in the 1970's. Unfortunately, over and over in the 1980's, we have specific instances with specific individuals making specific allegations that Senator Tower drank to excess. I believe that makes a difference.

There are many who have said the FBI report is full of rumor and innuendo, absolutely; that the report is chock full of rumor and innuendo and absolute junk; that is without question. Mr. President, it is also clear to me that that record is filled with incidents of specific individuals, substantial individuals, named individuals who have talked about specific incidents in the 1980's.

Our job is to make sure this country does not make a serious mistake. That is our obligation, and if we are to discharge that obligation, then I think we have to put partisanship aside; I think we have to study the facts, and then we have to make an individual judgment.

I note that Senator Tower did that when he served in this body. When President Carter sent up the name of Ray Marshall to be Secretary of Labor, did John Tower rubberstamp that name? Did he say, "I differ, but it's OK?" No. John Tower voted no, and now he says on the talk shows that we are supposed to rubberstamp any nomination sent us by the President or we are challenging the President's authority. Apparently his view is changed.

Mr. President, I have more to say on the subject, but I note there are other colleagues who are seeking recognition and a chance to speak.

In summary, I have concluded that I cannot support the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I regret that. As I indicated earlier, I would very much like to have concluded that I could support John Tower. But as I read the reports, page after page, incident after incident, I am convinced, sincerely, firmly convinced he has a drinking problem—had it in the 1970's. I believe he continues to have it, and I believe his inability, frankly, to confront it, to recognize it, to identify it, is only a further indication of the depth of the problem. Any man who indicates that he drank excessively in the 1970's, many incidents related in the 1970's, who says he drank excessively but did not abuse alcohol has not faced up to the problem. And if this were some other job, some other Cabinet position—Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of Labor—I for one would be quick to overlook these questions. But this job is not Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Labor, Secretary of Commerce. This job is Secretary of Defense. In that position I do not believe it is prudent or wise to place a man when there are serious questions as to his drinking behavior.

With that I yield the floor.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I say to my friend and colleague from North Dakota that I regret his decision. Obviously, I am in disagreement. I respect his decision, however, and I hope that in the future we can avoid the kind of acrimony that we have seen on the floor today. I hope we can get this issue resolved by the weekend and that we can return to the atmosphere which usually permeates this body, an atmosphere of mutual respect and collegiality, without which I think this body would find it very difficult to function.

Mr. President, in what I hope is a final attempt to set the record straight, I would like to discuss the story contained in the Washington Post last week in which a retired Air Force sergeant allegedly said he observed improper conduct by Senator Tower at Bergstrom Air Force Base, TX, while the sergeant was serving on active duty at that base in the summer of 1977 and early 1978. I ask unanimous consent a letter from Col. Francis Moran, Chief, Legislation Division, Office of Legislative Liaison be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, DC, March 7, 1989.

Mr. PATRICK A. TUCKER,
Minority Staff Director, Senate Armed Services Committee, Washington, DC.

Dear Mr. TUCKER: Pursuant to your March 6, 1989, request to Anne Foreman, Air Force General Counsel, for the Air Force to attempt to confirm whether then Senator John Tower visited Bergstrom's Air Force Base, Texas, in the time frame 1976 to 1979, the following information is provided.

Although there is no one record system which would record such an event, a review of available records for this time frame indicates that there is no mention of such a visit by Senator Tower. The Base History and all base newspapers at Bergstrom Air Force Base covering this period were reviewed and there was no mention of a visit by Tower. Additionally, a check with the Public Affairs and History Officers at 12th Air Force and Headquarters Tactical Air Command indicate no mention of such a visit. A review of records for Air Force escorts for Members of Congress indicate two trips with Senator Tower in this time frame, but none to Bergstrom Air Force Base.

In view of the above, we contacted all of the past wing commanders for the period October 1974 to March 1, 1979. Col. George Sauls (Ret.) was Wing Commander from October 1974 to April 1976. Major General Davis Rohr (Ret.) was Vice Wing Commander from August 1975 to April 1976, and Wing Commander from April 1976 to August 1977. Col. Robert Pearson (Ret.) was Vice Wing Commander from July 1976 to August 1977, and Wing Commander from September 1977 to March 1979. General Rohr and Col. Sauls recall Senator Tower visiting the base during an Open House in 1975. With the exception of this one visit, all of the above wing commanders indicate that Tower was never on the base. They assert that, in their positions as Wing Commander or Vice Wing Commander, they have no doubt that if Senator Tower arrived on the base, either for a visit or simply transiting the base, they would have known and would have remembered.

Additionally, contact was made with the two Base Information Officers assigned to Bergstrom during the time in question. Major John C. Popkes (Ret.) was assigned in this position from May 1976 to December 1976. Lt. Col. Robert Russell (Ret.) was assigned in this position from December 1976 to March 1979. Neither recalls any visit by Senator Tower and both feel they would have known of such a visit.

Should you have any further questions, please feel free to call me at 697-5322.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS S. MORAN, Jr.,
Colonel, USAF, Chief, Legislation Division, Office of Legislative Liaison.

Mr. McCAIN. This letter states that a diligent search of available relevant Air Force records reveals that there were no visits to that base by Senator Tower during the period from 1976 through 1979. When this letter is considered with the evidence previously entered in the record showing that the sergeant's last duty day at Bergstrom was several months before he allegedly observed Senator Tower at the base, it is clear from the evidence that there is no substance to any charge that Senator Tower was even at the base, much less guilty of the conduct which was alleged by the retired sergeant and carried later in the national media.

Mr. President, just to avoid any misunderstanding, the document I just entered into the RECORD was furnished to the majority staff of the Armed Services Committee at the same time I received it. This was done by the Air Force Legislative Liaison Office because of the majority staff director's request that the Air Force provide no information to the minority of the committee without the same information being provided to the majority of the committee.

Mr. President, I would like to make a couple of comments the allegations concerning Senator Tower's visit, or actually nonvisit to Bergstrom Air Force Base.

First of all, the surfacing of these allegations was a terribly unfortunate example of a leak from the FBI files in S-407 to the media. I do not accuse any member of the media of exhibiting bias in this case. The media obviously feels it has an obligation to print the information which they receive, so I place no responsiblity for this unfortunate incident on the media. I do feel, however, that a case could be made that in this, and other cases, the kind of corroboration should have been sought that I have provided for the RECORD before printing such information.

At the same time, I understand that they may have felt compelled to. Second, the fact that this information was leaked to the media, and printed, as so many other unproven allegations have been indeed tragic. It has caused a false impression to be created in the minds of the American people. Like me, they have to find any allegation to be deeply disturbing that charges a U.S. Senator would make sexual advances to a member of the Armed Forces. That is why, when I read this allegation, I was terribly concerned and upset that such charge could possibly be published. The distinguished chairman of the committee has said that this allegation was largely disregarded in the deliberations that he and many other members of the committee made because it had no corroboration. Nevertheless, it appeared in print, and then in the visual media as well, I became alarmed at the damage it was doing, but there was very little that I could do about it until I received a phone call from Major General Rhor who happened to be the wing commander at the time of the alleged incident.

He was understandably upset because he was present at the base during this period of time and saw no incident as alleged. In fact, he remembered with great clarity the one visit in 1975 that Senator Tower made, and he remembered incidents such as the weather conditions which caused a curtailment of the Air Force Thunderbird performance that day. Indeed he, General Hughes, and General Hughes' wife escorted Senator Tower during his entire visit to the base. When I received that information, I thought we ought to follow up. I called over the transition team and told them that they should contact other people who had served at Bergstrom to see if we could find out exactly what took place, and if there was any evidence that would either substantiate the allegation—and I emphasize the very damaging allegation—that it appeared in the Washington Post, or find information which would refute it.

I became steadily more concerned during the course of the day when I was informed that one of the major networks was going to run an interview with the retired sergeant who made the allegation on the evening news. I felt that if indeed the allegation was false, as I believed that it was, and an interview was run on the evening news, this would seriously further damage the credibility and reputation of John Tower.

I would like to yield, Mr. President, to the distinguished majority leader at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

For the benefit of our colleagues, I have just spoken with the distinguished Republican leader and want to announce that there will be no votes tonight. It is my expectation that we should continue until approximately 7 p.m. Would that be acceptable to the Senator from Arizona in terms of completing his remarks?

Mr. McCAIN. I would say to the distinguished majority leader that I think 5 more minutes would be sufficient to complete my remarks.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then what I would suggest is that we continue until the hour of 7 p.m. and that we come back in tomorrow morning.

I will return just prior to 7 after the Senators remaining complete what remarks they wish and I have the opportunity to give the distinguished Republican leader the opportunity to come to the floor for the wrapup.

So Senators may be aware, I repeat, there will be no more rollcall votes this evening, and we will be remaining in session for at the most approximately 25 minutes. I will have an announcement regarding tomorrow's schedule between now and 7 p.m.

I thank the Senator very much for yielding to me to make that announcement and for the benefit of our colleagues.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, as I was saying, I was then presented with the information on Sergeant Jackson which had been requested by the minority. The request for this information was perfectly within the rules of the Senate and the laws of the United States. It was provided by the Department of the Air Force general counsel. The information was read over the phone at the time I said we needed to have the information in writing. The hour was late, however, and it was about 4:30 in the afternoon. The evening news was being prepared for presentation within the hour to the American people. At that time I had to make a decision as to whether to come to the floor of the Senate, and give the information that I had received. That information was first, that the previous wing commanders had all stated unequivocally that John Tower had not visited the base except in 1975. It was second, that the retired sergeant had certain psychiatric problems as a member of the Air Force, and while he was stationed at Bergstrom Air Force Base.

I am fully aware of every citizen's right to privacy. I respect and cherish that right. But I believe when a citizen not only came forward and made allegations to the FBI, but again confirmed and rearticulated those charges, once those allegations were leaked to the public, and appeared in the Washington Post, I felt that individual had forfeited his right. He was making what I was convinced were false allegations against a person who did not deserve such treatment.

So, in keeping with my rights as a U.S. Senator, I repeated the information that was transmitted by the general counsel, of the Department of the Air Force, to Mr. Pat Rucker, the minority staff director.

Now, if the majority was not informed properly of how the data evolved, I hope they will accept my apologies. We on the minority side have been extremely sensitive at times when we have believed either rightly or wrongly we were not fully informed of what was happening. My excuse to the majority is that the time elements involved, and the fact that an interview with this individual was going to be shown on the evening news, prevented me from taking the time to provide the information to the majority. I will make every effort in the future to make sure that all information that we receive is shared immediately upon receipt.

Mr. President, more information was relayed to us by the general counsel of the Air Force on Friday, and then again on Monday. I will not again go through this information, Mr. President. It is all part of the record. But the fact is that it clearly shows that this witness was not reliable. Coupled with the information that I have just provided concerning the testimony of the previous wing commanders, and base commanders, the 12th Air Force commander, and indeed the master sergeant of the U.S. Air Force who at that time was serving as the master sergeant of the 12th Air Force, it is clear that serious damage was done to Senator Tower's reputation, that all the evidence indicates was based on false allegations.

Mr. President, I hope we can put this issue behind us at this time. I think it is a sad commentary, that we have reached the point where we are now in the business of hearing allegations in the media, which have been leaked from the confidential documents. That we are then required to provide a rebuttal. We then have to deal with allegations of fairness, of unfairness, and we then have to provide further substantiation. Frankly, I am sure that the Department of the Air Force has better things to do than spend untold hours locating and interviewing former base commanders and wing commanders from Bergstrom Air Force Base in Austin, TX.

I think this whole episode is a compelling argument that we must change our current procedures, if we have changed the standards for nominees, which I believe we have, then the procedures must be changed, as well.

I am not sure that the recommendation of the distinguished Senator from Alaska is appropriate, but I am convinced that there will always be leaks of confidential information to the media. This is simply a reality of the environment in which we live.

Mr. President, I think we have to recognize that at least segments of the information which is declared confidential will not be confidential. Accordingly, we must give a nominee the same rights that every citizen has, and these rights include the right to face one's accuser. An accuser cannot be allowed to hide behind the cloak of anonymity, which, as the Presiding Officer, Mr. CONRAD well knows, is the cloak worn by most of those who fill the FBI files on John Tower. Indeed, if a person is going to make an allegation, that person must be willing to come forward and testify in some kind of formal arrangement. We must be sure that there is both validity to the charges that are being made, and responsibility for the charges being made.

Mr. President, I would like to repeat that I did not enjoy, and I will always regret, having been forced to divulge information about an individual's medical past. At the same time, the only option to withholding that information was to allow false allegation to be spread across this Nation. Despite my deep regret, what I did was necessary to see that justice was done in this case.

I am hopeful, Mr. President, that we can return to the kind of collegiality and close-knit relationship which has characterized this body for over 200 years after this vote is completed. I am also hopeful that we can recognize that there are pressing issues of national security which face the Senate Armed Services Committee and that we will be able to work together in a fashion which has characterized the performance of the Senate Armed Services Committee, perhaps more so than any other committee in the Senate. We are compelled to work together for the good of this Nation and its security. There is no other way that we can adequately address these issues without doing so. But, we must devise ways to ensure to the American people that the nominees for any office and any position in this country are fairly treated.

Mr. President, with that, I yield the floor.

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, first, let me extend my appreciation to my friend from Arizona for his statement and for the clarification which he provided to the Senate. I think everybody in the Senate appreciated what he had to say and the tone that he brought to it. That tone is essentially one that, after this matter is over, we all look forward to a return to normalcy, and everybody in the Senate will join him in that wish. The leak was unfortunate. All leaks of confidential information are unfortunate.

As my friend from Arizona pointed out, after it did hit the newspaper, Senator NUNN indicated that the item was a fact in his consideration and his knowledge and the consideration of the committee, and I believe Senator COHEN joined in a similar statement. If there is any redeeming feature in the whole incident, it would be that that particular allegation was not a factor in the committee's consideration. That does not undo the damage of the leak, as my friend from Arizona has pointed out. We appreciate the Senator's statement.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MCCAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MCCAIN. I thank my friend from Michigan for his kind remarks. I serve on several subcommittees, perhaps too many, with my friend from Michigan. I look forward to the opportunity of working with him as soon as possible, as we address the important issues that affect national security, and, particularly, those areas in which he has become so well known, in the areas of maintaining the readiness of our Nation's Armed Forces to perform whatever duties they may be called upon to perform.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while we are waiting for the majority leader, I would like to touch on one point I intended to make today. I was going to ask the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, Senator RUDMAN, to respond to a question.

Mr. President, much has been made of the unfounded view that John Tower pocketed $1 million from defense contractors. I want to set the record straight.

First, I want to recall what many—on both sides of this question—I have said all along. John Tower broke no laws, rules or regulations.

As for the money he legally earned, I believe it is important to note the following.

Six companies with defense interests paid Tower and associates $764,000—and that is a rounded figure—over 2½ years. Some have tried to stretch that three-quarters of a million dollars into $1 million by adding in a contract with British Aerospace, Inc., a Delaware corporation.

In fact, John's work for British Aerospace, Inc., was helping sell purely commercial aircraft. So the defense-related figure is $764,000.

That $764,000 is just a top line. Tower had overhead to pay—about 60 cents on the dollar. He paid his staff, office rent, business travel, other expenses and, of course, taxes.

Thus, in 1987 John Tower netted just over $100,000—not as much as the Senator who earns, in addition to his salary, $35,000 in honoraria—and in 1988 a bit over $150,000 from defense-related contracts.

John also had income from his Federal pension, from lecturing at Southern Methodist University, and from a number of contracts unrelated to defense.

Three things are clear. First, John Tower made a very comfortable living, but he was never—and is not now—a rich man. Second, in his 2½ years as a consultant, he was never dependent on the defense industry. Third, his defense-related income never approached $1 million.

I cite as sources for these figures two Dallas Morning News articles. Naturally, these figures are unaudited, but I have checked with Senator Tower's office, and I am told they are reasonably accurate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have these two articles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Dallas Morning News, Jan. 25, 1989]

CONSULTANT TOWER EARNED $665,277

(By Richard Whittle)

WASHINGTON.—Former Texas Sen. John Tower, President Bush's choice for defense secretary, last year earned $665,277 in consulting and director fees—mainly from defense firms—and $74,000 for giving speeches, his financial disclosure report shows.

He also got $50,000 for lecturing at Southern Methodist University in Dallas, $48,743 in federal pensions, plus other income for reported earnings in 1988 of at least $842,476.

But Tower—whose confirmation hearings begin Wednesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee—reports that he owns no real estate. Since his 1987 divorce from his second wife, Lilla, he has lived in a Dallas apartment and a Washington hotel suite.

He owns no securities, except for an option to buy 5,000 shares in Micronyx, a Richardson computer firm. His disclosure statement says he received the stock option as a consulting fee; the stock value is estimated at $3 a share.

Tower's only assets, according to his disclosure report, are a checking account of less than $5,000, an Individual Retirement Account valued at $5,001 to $15,000, and a NOW account containing $15,001 to $50,000.

Aides to Tower, a Republican and former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, acknowledged in December that defense consulting fees accounted for much of his income after he resigned as a U.S. arms-control negotiator in 1986.

But the disclosure statement, required of all Cabinet appointees, reveals specifics that Tower's aides and some of his defense clients refused to divulge before Bush chose Tower for the Pentagon job on Dec. 16.

Some critics had argued that Tower was too closely tied to the defense industry to handle the cuts necessary to match declining budgets mandated by Congress. Some also have argued that Tower could have conflicts of interest as defense secretary.

Tower has refused to give interviews since his nomination. But a spokesman, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Tower had given the Armed Services Committee a more detailed statement on his consulting contracts, all of which have been terminated.

"And there's no deferred compensation, no pension plans, nothing," the spokesman added.

Officials in the U.S. Office of Government Ethics formally determined in reviewing Tower's statement that the report disclosed "no conflict of interest under applicable laws and regulations."

The disclosure form states that all of the consulting fees were paid under personal contracts with Tower. The services were performed by his company, Tower & Associates, which had offices in Dallas and Washington and was staffed by two defense specialists, Richard Bilmire and Michelle Markoff.

Tower, who is expected to face questioning from the Senate panel on the conflict-of-interest issue, listed consulting or director fees in 1988 from these defense-related firms:

$102,860 from LTV Aerospace & Defense Co. of Dallas.

$92,000 from Martin-Marietta Information Systems Group, a subsidiary of the defense firm Martin-Marietta Corp.

$79,167 from Hicks & Associates, a Pentagon consulting firm headed by Donald Hicks, who was undersecretary of defense for research from 1985 to 1986.

$30,250 from Rockwell International Inc. of El Segundo, Calif., a major military contractor.

$10,000 from Jeford-McManns International Inc., a Washington defense consulting firm.

Tower also received $104,166 from the U.S. subsidiary of British Aerospace PLC, which builds the Harrier fighter jet and other weapons systems. But company spokesman George Dahlman said the U.S. subsidiary primarily markets commercial aircraft and "I don't think he (Tower) did much as far as military stuff goes."

Tower's largest consulting fee was the $153,334 he reported from Maxwell Communication Corporation PLC of London, the publishing conglomerate headed by Robert Maxwell, a flamboyant tycoon featured last fall on CBS-TV's 60 Minutes.

Tower, who was a college professor in Texas before he began his Senate career in 1961, also made substantial amounts of money—$220,702.40 in 1987 and $74,000 in 1988—for speaking to college audiences and business concerns.

Efforts to determine the nature of Tower's consulting work for several of the firms were unsuccessful.

But Hicks, the former undersecretary of defense who hired Tower as a consultant to his own consulting firm said Tower advised some of his corporate clients on whether Congress might approve and fund defense programs they were interested in bidding on.

"The people over here (in Hicks' office) know a lot about defense," Hicks said. "You also have to know what the hell Congress is going to be doing. What we've used Tower's people for and Tower himself is to give us some insight into whether a program would go or would not go (in Congress)."

TOWER MADE $1.65 MILLION IN 1987-88; $547,700 WAS LEFT AFTER BUSINESS, TAXES, ALIMONY

WASHINGTON.—Defense Secretary-designate John Tower earned $1.65 million during the last two years, and was left with $547,700 after business expenses, taxes and alimony, according to a summary of the former Texas senator's finances obtained Friday.

The summary shows that Tower's earnings as head of Tower & Associates, the consulting firm he formed after resigning as a U.S. arms-control negotiator in April 1986, were largely spent on staff salaries, two offices, travel, taxes, and alimony he must pay to his former wife, Lilla Cummings Tower.

The Towers were divorced in 1987. Tower paid his ex-wife $25,100 in alimony in 1987 and $67,100 in 1988, according to previously undisclosed information in the summary obtained by The Dallas Morning News.

He also paid legal fees in the case, in which Mrs. Tower accused him of "marital misconduct," of $30,00 in 1988, the summary reveals.

Tower's finances have been among the key issues in his drawn-out struggle to win Senate confirmation as secretary of defense. In addition to concern over allegations of heavy drinking and womanizing, Armed Services Committee members have expressed doubts about whether a man who received lucrative fees from defense contractors should serve as secretary of defense.

The financial summary states that Tower paid $154,300 in taxes in 1987 and expects to pay $92,200 for 1988. Before taxes, his business expenses were $331,600 in 1987 and $402,200 last year, according to the summary.

A source close to Tower said the figures were reliable, but they could not be independently verified.

Though Tower's take-home pay for 1987-88 was more than $500,000, the source confirmed that the former senator's current assets were only about $100,000. The source, who insisted on anonymity, said Tower spent large sums on buying and furnishing a Dallas condominium and on investments that paid no return, including a failed attempt with several partners to buy the former First Republic Bank of Dallas.

Tower also is known for living well, as reflected in his tastes for tailored English suits, expensive British cigarettes and living when he is in Washington at one of the city's most elegant hotels.

If the Senate confirms him, Tower's salary would be $99,500—a sharp reduction from his income of the previous two years. The source said Tower's alimony payments would be reduced in 1989, but the precise figure was unavailable.

President Bush said Friday during a visit to St. Louis that he was confident Tower would be confirmed. "I'm not worried," he said, brushing off new criticism of Tower by Kenneth Adelman, former director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. Adelman said Tower had engaged in "indiscretions" in Geneva as a member of the U.S. arms negotiating delegation that were "troublesome."

Assistant FBI Director Milt Ahlerich, meanwhile, said the agency was "in the latter stages of winding up" a report for the Armed Services Committee on recent allegations about Tower's personal and business affairs.

And Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican, said at an impromptu news conference that the panel had received new material on Tower and given it to the White House. Warner said the material consisted of "several letters" but refused to elaborate.

Committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., has said the panel could vote on Tower's nomination next week if it receives the FBI report.

According to Nunn, Tower provided to the committee detailed financial statements and copies of his tax returns for 1985, 1986 and 1987.

In his confirmation hearings, Tower testified that he had cut all ties to his consulting clients as of Dec. 1, had no conflicts of interest and would scrupulously avoid any favoritism toward his former clients.

But some senators questioned the size of the fees Tower received from defense companies as a consultant after leaving the Senate and the U.S. arms-control negotiating team in Geneva, where he was chief negotiator on long-range arms.

The summary shows that defense consulting fees accounted for $271,500, or 34 percent of his total 1987 income of $805,200 and $384,300, or 45 percent of his total 1988 income of $845,000. A source close to Tower said he earned $108,200 from defense consulting in 1986.

Tower's closest associates said they were dismayed that comments by some Senators and reports at Tower's income from government financial disclosure forms suggested that the former Armed Services chairman had become rich by cashing in on his Senate and arms-control experience. The disclosure reports provide no details on how an official's income is spent.

His financial disclosure statements for 1985 and 1986, when Tower was an arms-control negotiator, and for 1988, required after Bush nominated him as defense secretary, show that the 63-year-old Senate veteran accumulated no investment property or securities over the years.

The 1988 form showed that his only cash assets were a checking account of less than $5,000, an Individual Retirement Account of $5,001 to $15,000, and a NOW, account containing $15,001 to $50,000.

Tower bought his condominium in Dallas in 1987 with a mortgage of $170,000, payable over 15 years to the then Republic Bank Dallas, according to deeds on file in Dallas. In Washington, he lives in a single room at the Jefferson Hotel, for which he pays about $100 a night, a close associate said.

Under Texas law, there is no requirement to record the purchase price of real estate nor are there tax stamps to indicate the sale price, but a source close to Tower estimated that the nominate paid $200,000 for the Dallas condo.

"He went into the Senate having no money and he came out and he had no money and the financial records show that," said Paul W. Eggers, a longtime Tower friend and attorney.

"He came out (of the Senate) and he had a job teaching," Eggers said, referring to a $50,000-a-year position Tower had as a lecturer at Southern Methodist University after he left the Senate.

"But with the alimony payments he was stuck with, he had to make money somewhere. And when he paid taxes made those alimony payments and all, it took a good part of the money he was making (as consultant)."

A Pentagon official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that Tower had been working without pay on Defense Department matters since he canceled his consulting contracts on Dec. 1.

Tower also receives federal pensions that amounted to $48,743 in 1988, his government disclosure statement shows. But under federal law, his pension would halt when he took office as defense secretary and resume only after he had left that job.

As a consultant, Tower was retained by four major defense contractors, one other firm and two companies with defense interests, the commercial arm of Britain Aerospace PLC, which makes defense items, and by Maxwell Communication Corporation PLC of London, a publishing conglomerate.

His major defense-contractor clients were LTV Aerospace & Defense Co., Martin-Marietta Information Systems, Rockwell International Inc. and Taxtron Inc., parent company of Bell Helicopter Textron of Fort Worth. Tower's fees for those and his other clients ranged from $10,000 to $153,334, according to his 1988 financial disclosure statement.

Unlike other consultants who bill their clients for expenses, Tower paid all his business expenses out of his fees, according to those close to him.

Those expenses, according to the financial summary, included salaries for five employees of Tower & Associates, the cost of maintaining offices in Dallas and Washington, plus business and travel expenses for Tower and his aides.

"He was John Tower doing business as Tower & Associates," said one Tower ally, speaking on condition of anonymity. "It's like a mom-and-pop proprietorship. The checks go to him, then he makes out the checks to his employees.

The financial summary lists Tower's staff expenses for 1987 as $190,000 and for 1988 as $268,700.

Tower employed Michelle Markoff, an arms-control expert, and Richard Billmine, an economist, as professional aides. To do secretarial, accounting, scheduling and other work, he employed Kim Sariven, Martha Kirkendall and Marian Tower, one of his three adult daughters.

The summary shows that Tower paid $75,900 in 1987 and $61,700 in 1988 for office rent and expenses and $65,700 in 1987 and $71,800 in 1988 for travel for himself and his aides. Tower maintained offices in Dallas and Washington, and he frequently traveled around the United States and overseas.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the matter of two resolutions they be handled as though in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMENDING WILLIAM D. MOHR, SENIOR REPORTER, OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATE, ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RETIREMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President on behalf of Mr. DOLE and myself, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 77) relating to the retirement of William D. Mohr.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today the Senate takes a moment to recognize and commend William D. Mohr, Senior Reporter, Official Reporters of Debates, upon the completion of almost 23 years of outstanding service to this body.

Early in 1942, Mr. Mohr displayed a natural aptitude as a Pittman reporter by passing the New Jersey Certified Shorthand Reporter examination, and began his career in New Jersey as an official court reporter.

He became a member of the staff of the Official Reporters of Debates, U.S. Senate, in April of 1966. His responsibilities, of course, are focused on the production of the Senate portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

During his tenure in this office, Mr. Mohr also passed the Merit Examination given by the National Shorthand Reporters Association, truly a strong indicator of his excellent abilities.

For almost the last 15 years, Mr. Mohr has taken on an additional task, one which further serves the Senate and will perpetually continue to serve the Senate in the future. He has been the mentor of each of the present Debate Reporters, including the present Chief Reporter. His instruction, his dedication to accuracy, his constant endeavor to present the proceedings of the Senate in a manner truly depicting that which it is—a historical document reflecting the history of this body—will be continued by those who have been the beneficiaries of Mr. Mohr's expertise and guidance.

Now Bill and his wife Lynne will begin a new era in their lives as he enters upon retirement. We all wish them well, and know that the U.S. Senate and his associates in the Office of the Official Reporters of Debates alike will long remember and value his efforts in their behalf. He will most assuredly be missed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 77) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 77

Whereas, on March 31, 1989, William D. Mohr will retire from service as Senior Official Reporter of Debates after 23 years;

Whereas, "Bill" has served the United States Senate with honor and distinction since joining the staff of the Official Reporters of Debates on April 18, 1966;

Whereas, he has devoted 15 years to instilling his expertise in the exactitude demanded in the daily preparation of the Congressional Record in new staff members;

Whereas, since the inception of the Record the daily proceedings of the United States Senate have been reported using pen shorthand, and with the retirement of William D. Mohr, as the United States Senate's last pen shorthand reporter, comes the end of an era; and

Whereas, William D. Mohr has demonstrated loyal dedication to the United States Senate as an institution and leaves a legacy of impeccable service: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Senate expresses its deep appreciation and gratitude to William D. Mohr for his years of faithful and exemplary service to his country and to the United States Senate.

SEC. 2. The Secretary shall transmit a copy of this resolution to William D. Mohr.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

COMMENDING LEE H. (JIM) TIMBERLAKE, EDITOR OF THE DAILY DIGEST, ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RETIREMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. DOLE and myself, I send another resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 78) relating to the retirement of Lee H. (Jim) Timberlake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Jim, as most of us know him, is officially retiring on March 15 after more than 27 years of dedicated service under the direction of seven different Secretaries of the Senate. His Senate service began in 1961 as an Expert Transcriber in the office of the Official Reporters of Debates. For the next 19 years, he served in that office in various capacities, including Assistant to Chief Reporter where his duties were to assist in the editing and pagination in compiling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and Assistant Reporter where he was responsible for the morning business section of the RECORD. In 1980, Jim was appointed Editor of the Senate Daily Digest where he has served to date and has been responsible for rendering an accounting in concise language of all official actions of the Senate. During that time as Editor, Jim greatly contributed to the establishment of legislative applications to enhance the legis computer capabilities used by the legislative branch.

As a personal note, Jim was born and educated in my State of Maine. He graduated from Leavitt Academy in Turner, and attended Bates College in Lewiston. He came to Washington, DC, in 1957 and became a court reporter, at which time he met Charlotte Wick, also a court reporter, and they were married in 1958. They have two children, a son Chris and a daughter Claire, and a granddaughter Nicole.

Upon his departure from the Senate, Jim plans to remain active and is considering several interesting and rewarding pursuits. With the talent he has shown in all his endeavors, we know that further success lies ahead for him. We know, too, that Jim will not be far from the Senate in spirit, and we look forward to continuing our close and longstanding friendship with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 78) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, read as follows:

S. RES. 78

Whereas, Lee H. "Jim" Timberlake has faithfully served the United States Senate as Editor of the Daily Digest of the Congressional Record during the past 8 years;

Whereas, prior to that Jim rendered exemplary service in the Office of the Official Reporters of Debates of the United States Senate for 19 years;

Whereas, during this 27-year period, he has at all times discharged the difficult duties and responsibilities of his office with extraordinary efficiency, aplomb, and devotion; and

Whereas, Jim Timberlake's service to the Senate has been marked by his personal commitment to the highest standards of excellence: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Lee H. "Jim" Timberlake be and hereby is commended for his outstanding service to his country and to the United States Senate.

SEC. 2. The Secretary shall transmit a copy of this resolution to Lee H. Timberlake.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-27. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 163

"Whereas, the Commonwealth of Virginia, like most states, has several cities which have combined sanitary sewerage and stormwater systems that, on occasion, result in the direct discharge of untreated sanitary sewage and stormwater into rivers and streams during and immediately following rainfall; and

"Whereas, these combined sewer overflow ("CSO") problems are a long-standing condition of many older cities that have resulted from combined sewer construction practices which were, in many cases, state-of-the-art at the time of installation, but which, with today's wastewater treatment technologies, are now the source of CSOs; and

"Whereas, the correction of significant CSO problems such as those faced by hundreds of cities across the United States is a matter of great technical complexity and cost many millions of dollars in excess of those costs normally associated with the treatment of wastewater from separate sanitary sewer systems; and

"Whereas, the cities in the Commonwealth with significant CSO problems have already spent many millions of dollars in local funds to address their CSO problems; and

"Whereas, many cities across the United States, including those cities in the Commonwealth with significant CSO problems, have either developed or are in the process of developing plans for additional controls on their CSOs; and

"Whereas, the total cost of implementing these CSO control plans nationwide is estimated to be in the billions of dollars; and

"Whereas, federal funds are currently unavailable for CSO control; and

"Whereas, the cost of CSO control is so great that, even with state grant funding, the control centers have the potential for imposing very serious financial burdens on those cities with significant CSO problems; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to provide substantial grant funding for the implementation of CSO control when it next reauthorizes the Clean Water Act and to make that grant funding available to those localities with CSO control plans whose costs of implementation exceed their financial capability; and, be it

"Resolved further, That the Clerk of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President of the Senate of the United States, and the members of the Virginia Delegation to the United States Congress that they may be apprised of the sense of the General Assembly in this matter."

POM-28. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 75

"Whereas, Article VI of the Constitution of the United States provides in part that the "* * * Constitution * * * and all treaties made * * * under the authority of the United States * * * shall be the supreme law of the land * * *"; and

"Whereas, Virginians join with other Americans in the strongly held conviction that, whatever its possible imperfections, they would not trade their form of government and its blessings of individual liberty and personal freedom for any other on earth; and

"Whereas, the Constitution of the United States vests the President of the United States, subject to the advice and consent of the United States Senate, with the power to make treaties with foreign governments; and

"Whereas, treaties so made become a part of "the supreme law of the land"; and

"Whereas, in recent years the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has entered into several far-reaching multilateral treaties on human rights, arms control, and other subjects dealt with in the Constitution itself, particularly the first ten amendments thereto known collectively as the Bill of Rights; and

"Whereas, it is highly desirable that, in endeavoring aggressively to promote and defend for the inhabitants of other countries the human rights and personal dignity we hold so dear, the federal government take every conceivable precaution that custody over our liberties is not surrendered to foreign powers or any international organization;

"Whereas, the tenth amendment to the Constitution provides that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized vigilantly to guard against the abridgement or erosion, through the treaty-making process, of the freedoms guaranteed to all Americans through the Bill of Rights contained in the Constitution of the United States; and, be it

"Resolved further, That the Clerk of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, and the members of the Virginia delegation to the United States Congress in order that they may be apprised of the sense of the General Assembly of Virginia."

POM-29. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia; to the Committee on Financing.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 122

"Whereas, the Commonwealth of Virginia and all other states are prohibited from requiring out-of-state mail order vendors and other direct marketers to collect state and local sales taxes on goods sold in the states, as a result of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in National Bellas Hess v. Illinois Department of Revenue, 386 U.S. 753 (1967); and

"Whereas, recently there has been substantial growth in mail order sales in the Commonwealth, and it is estimated that the Commonwealth loses approximately $54 million in tax revenues annually because mail order houses cannot be compelled to collect sales tax; and

"Whereas, this limitation on state taxing authority undermines the equity and fairness of state and local tax systems, and places other retail merchants at a competitive disadvantage with mail order vendors and other direct marketers because most retail merchants are required to collect sales tax from their customers; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the General Assembly of Virginia by this resolution memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation authorizing the states to require out-of-state order vendors to collect sales taxes from their customers to facilitate tax equity in the Commonwealth of Virginia; and, be it

"Resolved further, That the Clerk of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives; the President of the Senate of the United States; the chairmen of the House Judiciary Committee, the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee; and the members of the Virginia delegation to the United States Congress that they may be apprised of the sense of the General Assembly of Virginia in this matter."

POM-30. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 167

"Whereas, the national debt stands at $2.7 trillion with no hope of retiring the debt quickly; and

"Whereas, during World War I, the United States lent Great Britain, France and Japan $10 billion; and

"Whereas, during World War II, the United States lent $100 billion to European nations to finance the defeat of Nazi Germany; and

"Whereas, during the Korean War, the United States again, out of kindness, lent another $10 billion; and

"Whereas, the figures, after annual interest at a rate of six percent, amount to in excess of $2 trillion, 320 billion, nearly enough to eliminate the national debt; now, therefore, be it.

"Resolved by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the Congress of the United States is memorialized to demand that these foreign borrowers repay their loans with interest; and, be it

"Resolved further, That while the United States is a kind, compassionate and generous nation, foreign borrowers should not abuse such generosity; and, be it

"Resolved finally, That the Clerk of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President of the Senate of the United States and the members of the Virginia Delegation to the United States Congress, that they may be apprised of the sense of the General Assembly of Virginia in this matter."

POM-31. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 3

"Whereas, the Congress adopted and the President signed the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988; and

"Whereas, the burden of financing the Act falls primarily upon the elderly citizens who are living on fixed, limited incomes; and

"Whereas, the Act constitutes the greatest expansion of Medicare benefits in the twenty-three year history of the program, and the costs of the expansion have yet to be fully determined; and

"Whereas, the Act imposed increased taxes upon recipients which were described by its sponsors as a premium for insurance, but the Act in reality subverts free choice and is not an optional insurance program; and

"Whereas, the Act greatly expands coverage with untold fiscal consequences, but fails to address the costs of long term care in nursing homes which may actually be the most catastrophic cost to the elderly; and

"Whereas, vastly expanded services are designed to be available to only a limited number of beneficiaries, and as a consequence the Act will inevitably pressure the system to expand eligibility and coverage levels, with the result that the program will be overtaxed and significantly underfunded; and

"Whereas, senior citizens in Idaho and the nation do not deserve to be saddled with the costs of a health care program which most of them will never qualify to use and which many have already contracted with private insurers to provide. Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the members of the First Regular Session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, the House of Representatives and the Senate concurring therein, that we urge the Congress of the United States to immediately address the issues raised by implementation of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988, and substantially revise the Act to modify the impact upon individual senior citizens. If a need exists for a program of this scope, the method of funding must be reversed in order to protect the limited resources of the elderly from an unwarranted assault by the federal government. The Act was adopted amid confusion and uncertainty and the issues which have been raised since the enactment warrant thorough study and comprehensive amendment; and, be it further

"Resolved, that the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward a copy of this Memorial to the President of the United States, George Bush, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and the congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM-32. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Finance.

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 8

"Whereas, the Union Pacific Railroad Company has initiated proceedings with the Interstate Commerce Commission to abandon 30.8 miles of branch line known as the Teton Valley Branch in Fremont and Teton Counties, Idaho; and

"Whereas, the abandonment of rail lines and the discontinuance of rail services is governed by federal law; and

"Whereas, the Interstate Commerce Commission is the federal agency vested with the authority to authorize the abandonment or discontinuance of rail service; and

"Whereas, Section 62-424, Idaho Code, vests the Idaho Public Utilities Commission with the authority to represent the people of the State of Idaho before the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

"Whereas, the Union Pacific Railroad Company had embargoed and discontinued service on the Teton Valley Branch during 1988; and

"Whereas, the Union Pacific Railroad Company had not participated in a state proceeding to determine whether the abandonment of this branch line would have an adverse impact upon Idaho communities and their access to vital goods and services; and

"Whereas, the Idaho Public Utilities Commission will protest the abandonment of the Teton Valley Branch on the basis of the record developed before it at hearing in the affected area that realistic potential exists for rail shipments if the line can be preserved; and

"Whereas, the Idaho Public Utilities Commission will therefore request that the Interstate Commerce Commission institute an investigation into the proposed abandonment. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the members of the First Regular Session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, the House of Representatives and the Senate concurring therein, that we petition the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the abandonment of the Teton Valley Branch through oral hearing conducted at a location in close proximity to the affected rail line; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward a copy of this Memorial to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and the congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 4

"Whereas large scale rehabilitation, repair, and capacity improvements are ongoing necessities of the national highway transportation system;

"Whereas the highway transportation system is the most critical component of the physical infrastructure of the United States of America;

"Whereas there is a growing and concentrated national consensus for a program to serve the country's highway transportation needs through the year 2020;

"Whereas high quality highways are critical to the ability of manufacturers to build and deliver products, and to the ability of states and communities to attract new industry and to sustain economic growth;

"Whereas the competitive position of states and the nation in international trade is directly related to the quality of access to the interstate highway system and the physical condition of interstate and primary highways;

"Whereas current national policy makes no provision for continuing the Federal-Aid Highway Program into the future; and

"Whereas in all recent federal-aid highway acts, Congress had to include provisions for extending the Highway Trust Fund and the taxes which drive it. Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the state of Utah, as a member of the Multistate Highway Transportation Agreement, encourages the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to make permanent the Highway Trust Fund and the user fees accruing to it, so that a reliable funding source is available for constructing, rehabilitating, and otherwise improving the highways and bridges which are so essential to the economic vigor of both Utah and the nation. Be it further

"Resolved, That the Highway Trust Fund be protected from predatory proposals to divert highway user revenues to programs entirely unrelated to the transportation purposes for which the Highway Trust Fund was established; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Utah congressional delegation."

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 5

"Whereas the United States Congress is seeking some effective means of reducing the federal budget deficit in the immediate future;

"Whereas several proposals being considered for budget reduction purposes would increase the existing federal fuel taxes by various sizable increments;

"Whereas the United States Department of Energy has stated that "a motor fuel tax will create an economic loss which is of far greater magnitude than the possible benefits. . .";

"Whereas a gasoline tax for deficit reduction would be a regressive tax affecting the poor to a greater extent than other income levels;

"Whereas states would receive no direct revenue benefits, while incurring substantial increases in their public assistance costs;

"Whereas residents of the West pay more fuel taxes because they must travel greater distances by personal vehicles than residents of other regions and therefore, would bear a disproportionate burden of deficit reduction;

"Whereas since a great need continues to exist to rehabilitate and reconstruct the nation's transportation infrastructure, motor fuel taxes should continue to be dedicated to transportation purposes;

"Whereas the tourism industry, one of the most important employers in many states, would be adversely affected by a diversion of highway transportation funds;

"Whereas the GNP, Consumer Price Index, and employment all would be severely and negatively affected by such action; and

"Whereas raising the fuel excise tax for deficit reduction purposes would not only undermine the highway trust fund, but would also fail to get to the root of the problem. Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That Utah as a member of the Multistate Highway Transportation Agreement, through its Legislature, opposes the use of federal fuels taxes to reduce the federal deficit; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Utah congressional delegation, and to the National Economic Commission."

POM-35. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Texas; to the Committee on Armed Services.

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION NO. 22

"Whereas, The Texas Legislature is proud to add its support for congressional legislation providing that the Congressional Medal of Honor be awarded posthumously to Doris "Dorrie" Miller for exceptional acts of bravery during World War II; and

"Whereas, On December 7, 1941, Mr. Miller, a black man, was stationed at Pearl Harbor aboard the U.S.S. West Virginia when the ship came under attack by Japanese aircraft; a native of Waco, Texas, the young seaman was enlisted as a mess steward, the only duty then available to blacks in the Navy; and

"Whereas, With his ship's captain severely wounded, Seaman Miller risked his own life to drag the injured officer to a safer location where he could continue to receive reports and issue commands; when the captain eventually lost consciousness, Miller bravely manned one of the ship's machine guns; and

"Whereas, Although he had no prior training in machine gun operation, the courageous young seaman managed to down two Japanese planes before he was ordered to abandon the sinking vessel; and

"Whereas, In 1943, Doris Miller was killed along with 700 of his crewmen when a Japanese torpedo sank the light aircraft carrier on which he was serving; and

"Whereas, Although Seaman Miller's actions were undeniably heroic, the racial climate of the era prevented his heroism from being fully recognized; although a total of 167,000 blacks served in the Navy during World War II, by the end of the war fully 90 percent were still serving as mess stewards; moreover, no black soldier was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, our nation's highest accolade, during either World War I or II; and

"Whereas, In Seaman Miller's case, his remarkable actions were not disclosed until weeks after the attack and were initially acknowledged with only a letter of commendation; in May 1942, Admiral Chester W. Nimitz personally upgraded the award to a Navy Cross, the service's second highest honor; 40 years later, Doris Miller received belated recognition when a Knox-class frigate was named in his honor; and

"Whereas, The Congressional Medal of Honor may be rightfully awarded to any military person who ". . . distinguishes himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty . . ."; although nearly half a century has passed since the attack, Seaman Miller's courageous actions at Pearl Harbor endure in the hearts of many citizens, both black and white; his exceptional heroism on that day indeed merits our nation's highest honor: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the 71st Legislature of the State of Texas hereby honor the life and heroism of Seaman Doris "Dorrie" Miller and request the Congress of the United States to enact legislation permitting him to be awarded posthumously the Congressional Medal of Honor; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the Texas secretary of state forward official copies of this resolution to the president of the United States, to the speaker of the house of representatives and the president of the senate of the United States Congress, and to all members of the Texas delegation to the Congress, with the request that this resolution be officially entered in the Congressional Record as a memorial to the Congress of the United States of America."

POM-36. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Finance.

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"Whereas, extension of the steel Voluntary Restraint Arrangements will provide America's steel industry with a necessary, yet measured, defense against conditions abroad that have not changed much since the Voluntarily Restraint Arrangements program was first instituted in 1984; and

"Whereas, foreign producers still receive massive subsidies from their governments, foreign steel markets are still tightly restricted to imports, foreign producers still engage in pervasive "dumping" of steel, and there is still a serious structural imbalance between world steel supply and demand on the order of at least 100 million tons; and

"Whereas, a five-year extension will give the United States Government the time it needs to negotiate an end of these ongoing trade-distorting conditions abroad, and the United States cannot "unilaterally disarm" in steel by terminating the Voluntary Restraint Arrangements until such negotiations have been successfuly concluded; and

"Whereas, Voluntary Restraint Arrangements have enabled domestic steel producers to take significant steps to improve their international competitiveness—costs are down 35% since 1982, labor productivity is up 40% and quality has been greatly improved; and

"Whereas, despite these competitiveness gains, additional time is needed, because (1) the domestic steel industry still lags behind other major steel-producing countries in such key areas as product yield, energy efficiency and continuous casting rate, and (2) continued restructuring and modernization will be extremely expensive and (3) the industry's underlying economic condition still is fragile because of the enormous losses ($12 billion) sustained in 1982-1986; and

"Whereas, unlike most of its major foreign competition, which is subsidized, the United States steel industry must depend on continued profitability for meeting its future restructuring and modernization goals, and the domestic steel industry's continued profitability will be severely threatened if surges of unfairly traded imports are allowed to resume, in fact, such surges at this time could halt current or future modernization plans in their tracks; and

"Whereas, Voluntary Restraint Arrangements extension will continue to require annual cash flow commitments from major United States steel producers to assure ongoing worker retraining, reinvestment in new plant and equipment, and modernization of operations, which are critical to the domestic economy in general and United States steel consumers in particular; and

"Whereas, the domestic steel industry, and its continued self-help efforts to regain full international competitiveness, are uniquely important to America's national security, industiral base and infrastructure; and

"Whereas, there is no viable alternative to Voluntary Restraint Arrangements, because the only other alternative—a return to massive, and very costly, trade litigation—would cause considerable market disruption that would not be in the best interest of the industry, its domestic customers, the United States Government or our trading partners, many of whom would face imposition of huge penalty duties, therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memorialize Congress and the President of the United States to take prompt action to extend the steel Voluntary Restraint Arrangements for an additional five years; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Presiding Officers of each House of Congress and to each Member of Congress from Pennsylvania and to the President of the United States."

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. GLENN):

S. 519. A bill to prohibit smoking on any scheduled airline flight in intrastate, interstate, or overseas air transportation; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 520. A bill to encourage the States to enact legislation to grant immunity from personal civil liability, under certain circumstances, to volunteers working on behalf of nonprofit organizations and governmental entities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HATFIELD (for himself and Mr. PACKWOOD):

S. 521. A bill to provide for restoration of the Federal trust relationship with, and assistance to the Coquille Tribe of Indians and the individual members consisting of the Coquille Tribe of Indians and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 522. A bill to repeal South African Sanctions; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. ADAMS (for himself and Mr. GORTON):

S. 523. A bill to direct the Secretary of the Army to release a reversionary interest in certain lands in the Port of Benton, Washington, which were previously conveyed to the Port of Benton; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 524. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for coverage of adult day health care under the Medicare program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SHELBY:

S. 525. A bill to correct an error in Private Law 100-29 (relating to certain lands in Lamar County, AL); to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. MATSUNAGA:

S. 526. A bill for the relief of Hee Man Cheng; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BAUCUS:

S. 527. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to reclassify certain hospitals as sole community hospitals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. MATSUNAGA:

S. 528. A bill for the relief of Clayton Timothy Boyle and Clayton Louis Boyle, son and father; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 529. A bill for the relief of Dr. Samuel J. Wong and Mrs. Agnes J. Wong, husband and wife; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. GARN):

S. 530. A bill to enhance competition in the financial services sector, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. DOLE):

S. Res. 77. Resolution relating to the retirement of William D. Mohr; considered and agreed to.

S. Res. 78. Resolution relating to the retirement of Lee H. "Jim" Timberlake; considered and agreed to.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. GLENN):

S. 519. A bill to prohibit smoking on any scheduled airline flight in intrastate, interstate, or overseas air transportation; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

SMOKING BAN ON SCHEDULED AIRLINES

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce a bill to ban smoking on all domestic commercial airline flights. I'm pleased to be joined in offering this bill by my distinguished colleagues, Senators HATCH, KENNEDY, and GLENN.

Mr. President, by introducing this bill today, we're saying enough is enough.

We're saying that the continued assault on the health of nonsmokers should no longer be tolerated in airplanes. We're saying that the risks of passive smoking in the closed cabins of airplanes are too great to allow it to continue.

In February, Surgeon General C. Everett Koop issued a strong, new warning. Citing new evidence of the dangers of passive smoking in airplane cabins, the Surgeon General called for a total ban of smoking on commercial airline flights. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the National Cancer Institute statement, including Dr. Koop's remarks, be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, that warning should give us all cause to pause. It is not some idle recommendation. It is an action that the Surgeon General earlier today called long overdue.

Dr. Koop's statements in February were in response to a new study, published in the current edition of the Journal of the American Medical Association. This study looked specifically at the exposure to nicotine of those passengers seated in the nonsmoking sections of commercial airplanes.

The findings build on a body of evidence compiled over the years. The study found that nonsmoking passengers and flight attendants were exposed to significant levels of airborne nicotine. High enough levels, in fact, for its byproducts to be found in the individual's urine 72 hours after the exposure.

The problem is worsening as modern planes utilize more and more recirculated air. By 1990, the percentage of flying hours spent in planes with recirculated air systems is expected to grow by 33 percent from 1985.

In 1987, Congress passed a law banning smoking on domestic flights of two hours or less. I was pleased to have been the Senate sponsor of that provision. The ban has now been in place for almost a year. And it's been a success. As a frequent flyer, and as Chairman of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, I have the opportunity to talk to people at all levels of the airline industry; from the CEO's to the flight attendants to the passengers.

In those discussions, the response to the ban has been overwhelming It's good, and it's working. The only problem is that it doesn't apply to all flights.

The fact is, Mr. President, that as long as anyone is smoking in an airplane, everyone is suffering. That's not a situation this Senator can tolerate. The evidence is in. Try as one might, one can hardly dispute the solid and overwhelming body of evidence that says that smoking is dangerous.

Smoking is responsible for one of every six deaths in this country. Every Surgeon General since 1964 has taken steps to alert us to the dangers. Yet, we continue to see 390,000 preventable deaths each year.

Mr. President, with enactment of this legislation, we can take a small step forward in our efforts to reduce this terrible death count. Enough is enough.

Mr. President, it's time to get on the bandwagon. I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 519

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 404(d)(1)(A) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1374(d)(1)(A)) is amended by deleting ", if such flight is scheduled for 2 hours or less in duration".

(b) Section 404(d)(1)(C) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1934 (49 U.S.C. 1374(d)(1)(C)) is repealed.

SEC. 2. The first section of this Act shall take effect upon the date of the expiration of the 90 day period following the date of the enactment of this Act.

[From the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Feb. 8, 1989]

NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE STATEMENT

Airline passengers sitting in nonsmoking sections of aircraft are exposed to the cigarette smoke of passengers in the smoking section, according to a new study headed by scientists at the National Cancer Institute and the Environmental Protection Agency. Some passengers in the nonsmoking section were exposed to nicotine levels comparable to levels experienced by passengers in the smoking section of the aircraft, the study showed.

Commenting on the study, Surgeon General C. Everett Koop, M.D., said, "Separating cigarette smokers from nonsmokers on airline flights does not necessarily prevent nonsmoking passengers from absorbing carcinogens and other toxic substances found in tobacco smoke." Instead, he urged that "cigarette smoking be banned on all commercial flights."

The study is published in the Feb. 10 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Exposure to tobacco smoke was higher in newer aircraft, probably because of ventilation systems that recycle air, Koop said. Other planes with 100 percent fresh air had significantly less nocotine in the cabin air than those with 50 percent fresh air and 50 percent recirculating air, the study showed.

Koop said, "Passengers and attendants may be exposed to higher levels of environmental tobacco smoke in the next decades as the percentage of flying hours on airplanes with recirculation systems increases from 30 percent in 1985 to an estimated 40 percent in 1990."

The study, headed by Margaret E. Mattson, Ph.D., of NCI and Joellen Lewtas, Ph.D., of EPA, was conducted by a team of scientists from NCI, EPA, the American Health Foundation and the University of Massachusetts Medical School.

Nine passengers and flight attendants were studied during four flights (each flight was approximately four hours long) for a total of 36 observations. All subjects were nonsmokers, not regularly exposed to smoke, and were free from chronic respiratory disorders such as asthma, bronchitis or emphysema.

Each of the nine subjects wore monitoring devices to measure the level of nicotine exposure to the tobacco smoke in the cabin air. Urine samples were collected for three days after each flight. The urine samples were then analyzed for cotinine, a metabolite of nicotine found in the body after exposure to tobacco.

Measurable exposure to environmental tobacco smoke occurred for all subjects on all four flights. According to Dr. Mattson, "Passengers who experienced the greatest smoke exposure had the highest levels of urinary cotinine." Furthermore, passengers and attendants with the highest levels of cotinine were more likely to suffer from annoying consequences of eye and nose irritation. The authors also discussed the possibility that flight attendants assigned to nonsmoking sections may inhale more cigarette smoke than the passengers themselves. Flight attendants are repeatedly exposed over time, and they engage in greater physical activity during the flight and consequently have increased inspiratory rates.

In 1986, the adverse effects of cigarette smoking on previously healthy nonsmokers were well documented. Surgeon General Koop issued a report, the Health Consequences of Involuntary Smoking, which concluded that environmental tobacco smoke was a cause not only of lung cancer in nonsmokers, and of respiratory diseases, particularly among children, but also the cause of acute irritant effects in general. Furthermore, the National Academy of Sciences, after reviewing data on passive smoking aboard commercial aircraft, recommended a ban on smoking on all domestic commercial flights. The NAS cited four specific reasons: to minimize irritation; to reduce health risks; to reduce fire hazards aboard planes; and to bring cabin air quality in line with standards for other closed environments.

Since publication of these reports, public opinion by smokers and nonsmokers alike has been increasingly in favor of restricting smoking in public places and on airline flights.

VOLUNTEER PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation that encourages States to grant volunteers of nonprofit organizations immunity from civil liability when they are acting in good faith and within the scope of their official functions. The Volunteer Protection Act of 1989 will help to stem the decline in volunteers that has occurred in recent years due to the perception of volunteers that they may be held personally liable for their actions.

From town councils and charitable organizations to little league baseball teams and scout troops, America depends on volunteers. In 1987, 80 million adults volunteered 19.5 billion hours of their time which would have cost $150 billion in public employee salaries.

All branches of government are growing increasingly aware of the importance of volunteers as we attempt to reduce the Federal budget deficit. President Bush's call for a "thousand points of light," and the proposal by Senators MIKULSKI and NUNN for creation of a civil service program are two examples of the renewed emphasis on volunteerism. Yet before we increase our reliance on volunteers we must face the reality that the percentage of people volunteering has actually declined over the last several years.

What is the cause of the decline in volunteers? One factor is a perception among volunteers that they can be sued and potentially lose their homes, farms, and personal assets. In a 1988 Gallup survey, 1 in 6 volunteers reported withholding their services due to fear of liability. Eight percent of the nonprofit organizations surveyed reported that volunteers have resigned over liability concerns.

A related problem growing out of the liability crisis is the drastic increase in insurance premiums for nonprofit organizations. The potential liability of volunteers drives up the cost of insurance even for those organizations that have not been sued. In the 1988 Gallup survey, nonprofit organizations reported an average increase in insurance premiums of 155 percent since 1984. With the tight budgets of most nonprofit organizations, increase of this size can severely restrict the amount of services these organizations can provide. By providing incentives for States to grant immunity to volunteers, the Volunteer Protection Act will help to stabilize insurance costs for nonprofit organizations.

The Volunteer Protection Act protects volunteers who are acting in good faith and within the scope of their duties as volunteers by encouraging States to grant them immunity from civil liability. The act does not prevent those who have been harmed from obtaining redress through civil suits because they can still sue the organization. Additionally, the act does not require States to protect volunteers that act in a willful or wanton manner in order to qualify for the bill's incentives.

Although 36 States currently have some type of volunteer protection legislation the degree of protection varies widely. This bill would promote uniformity by encouraging all States to pass legislation, by fiscal year 1991, which contains the provisions of the Volunteer Protection Act. The bill provides States an incentive to act by granting a 1-percent increase in social service block grant funds for those States that enact volunteer protection legislation. An identical bill, H.R. 911, was introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman PORTER on February 7, 1989.

As Congress searches for ways to reduce the Federal deficit the call for volunteers grows louder. If we expect people to answer the call then we must extend the basic protections for volunteers embodied in the Volunteer Protection Act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the results of the Gallup survey be printed in the RECORD as follows:

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, a follows:

S. 520

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Volunteer Protection Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) within certain States, the willingness of volunteers to offer their services has been increasingly deterred by a perception that they thereby put personal assets at risk in the event of liability actions against the organization they serve;

(2) as a result of this perception, many nonprofit public and private organizations and governmental entities, including voluntary associations, social service agencies, educational institutions, local governments, foundations, and other civic programs, have been adversely affected through the withdrawal of volunteers from boards of directors and service in other capacities;

(3) the contribution of these programs to their communities is thereby diminished, resulting in fewer and higher cost programs than would be obtainable if volunteers were participating; and

(4) because Federal funds are expended on useful and cost-effective social service programs which depend heavily on volunteer participation, protection of voluntarism through clarification and limitation of the personal liability risks assumed by the volunteer in connection with such participation is an appropriate subject for Federal encouragement of State reform.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to promote the interests of social service program beneficiaries and taxpayers and to sustain the availability of programs and nonprofit organizations and governmental entities which depend on volunteer contributions by encouraging reasonable reform of State laws to provide protection from personal financial liability to volunteers serving with nonprofit organizations and governmental entities for actions undertaken in good faith on behalf of such organizations.

SEC. 3. NO PREEMPTION OF STATE TORT LAW.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to preempt the laws of any State governing tort liability actions.

SEC. 4. LIMITATION ON LIABILITY FOR VOLUNTEERS.

(a) LIABILITY PROTECTION FOR VOLUNTEERS.—Except as provided in subsections (b) and (d), any volunteer of a nonprofit organization or governmental entity shall incur no personal financial liability for any tort claim alleging damage or injury from any act or omission of the volunteer on behalf of the organization or entity if—

(1) such individual was acting in good faith and within the scope of such individual's official functions and duties with the organization or entity; and

(2) such damage or injury was not caused by willful and wanton misconduct by such individual.

(b) CONCERNING RESPONSIBILITY OF VOLUNTEERS WITH RESPECT TO ORGANIZATIONS.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any nonprofit organization or any governmental entity against any volunteer of such organization or entity.

(c) NO EFFECT ON LIABILITY OF ORGANIZATION.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect the liability of any nonprofit organization or governmental entity with respect to injury caused to any person.

(d) EXCEPTIONS TO VOLUNTEER LIABILITY PROTECTION.—A State may impose one or more of the following conditions on and exceptions to the granting of liability protection to any volunteer of an organization or entity required by subsection (a):

(1) The organization or entity must adhere to risk management procedures, including mandatory training of volunteers.

(2) The organization or entity shall be liable for the acts or omissions of its volunteers to the same extent as an employer is liable, under the laws of that State, for the acts or omissions of its employees.

(3) The protection from liability does not apply if the volunteer was operating a motor vehicle or was operating a vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which a pilot's license is required.

(4) The protection from liability does not apply in the case of a suit brought by an appropriate officer of a State or local government to enforce a Federal, State, or local law.

(5) The protection from liability shall apply only if the organization or entity provides a financially secure source of recovery for individuals who suffer injury as a result of actions taken by a volunteer on behalf of the organization or entity. A financially secure source of recovery may be an insurance policy within specified limits, comparable coverage from a risk pooling mechanism, equivalent assets, or alternative arrangements that satisfy the State that the entity will be able to pay for losses up to a specified amount. Separate standards for different types of liability exposure may be specified.

SEC. 5. CERTIFICATION REQUIREMENT AND ADJUSTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES BLOCK GRANT ALLOTMENTS.

(a) CERTIFICATION AND BLOCK GRANT ALLOTMENTS.—In the case of any State which certifies, not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, to the Secretary of Health and Human Services that it has enacted, adopted, or otherwise has in effect State law which substantially complies with section 4(a), the Secretary shall increase by 1 percent the fiscal year allotment which would otherwise be made to such State to carry out the Social Services Block Grant Program under title XX of the Social Security Act.

(b) CONTINUATION OF INCREASE.—Any increase made under subsection (a) in an allotment to a State shall remain in effect only if the State makes a certification to the Secretary of Health and Human Services, not later than the end of each 1-year period occurring successively after the end of the 2-year period described in subsection (a), that it has in effect State law which substantially complies with section 4(a).

SEC. 6. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "volunteer" means an individual performing services for a nonprofit organization or a governmental entity who does not receive compensation, or any other thing of value in lieu of compensation, for such services (other than reimbursement for expenses actually incurred or honoraria not to exceed $300 per year for government service), and such term includes a volunteer serving as a director, officer, trustee, or direct service volunteer;

(2) the term "nonprofit organization" means any organization described in section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and exempt from tax under section 501(a) of such Code;

(3) the term "damage or injury" includes physical, nonphysical, economic, and noneconomic damage; and

(4) the term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, any other territory or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any such State, territory, or possession.

THE LIABILITY CRISIS AND THE USE OF VOLUNTEERS BY NONPROFIT ASSOCIATIONS

INTRODUCTION

This report has been prepared by The Gallup Organization, Inc. for the Foundation of the ASAE. The report summarizes the findings of a survey of non-profit organization executives and volunteer board members concerning liability risk. The survey covered the following areas:

Survey of association executives:

1. Incidence of carrying director and officers liability insurance coverage.
2. Change in cost of liability coverage since 1984.
3. Changes resulting from concern for exposure to liability risk.
4. Practices used by non-profit organizations to minimize liability risks.
5. Incidence of suits over liability issues.
6. Effect of liability coverage on relations with association chapters.
7. Indemnification of directors or volunteers.
8. Perceived effect of liability exposure on volunteers.

Survey of board members:

1. Effect of liability crisis on participation in not-for-profit organizations.
2. Extent to which volunteers inquire into liability coverage and issues prior to accepting board membership.
3. Perceived effect of liability crisis on volunteers.
4. Incidence of refusing to serve due to fear of liability.
5. Experience with lawsuits.
6. Extent of insurance coverage.

SAMPLE DESIGN

The samples for this survey were drawn from two separate databases, one consisting of associations represented by ASAE members, and the other of associations represented by ASAE prospects (6,581 and 12,426 records respectively). Each organization record contained the name of an executive officer. A proportionate stratified random sample was drawn from each database, and proportionate interviewing quotas for executive officers were set for member and prospect organizations, in order that the survey results could be used to represent the opinions of executive officers in the total combined population of members and prospects.

In addition to the sample of executive officers, a sample of board members was interviewed. Since the names of board members were not available in the databases used as a sampling frame for the executive officer component of this study, interviewers took advantage of their executive officer contacts to generate a sample for the board member component.

Specifically, at the end of the interview, interviewers requested the names and telephone numbers of (1) the board chairperson, and (2) the most recently admitted board member. The rationale behind this purposive selection method was that it would provide a full range of opinion on the liability issues upon which the questionnaire focused, by representing the endpoints of the continuum of ingrained self-identification with the interests of the organization. This procedure possessed the additional advantage of not requiring the executive officers to provide a full (and sometimes extensive) list of board members. As with the executive officer component of the study, proportionate interviewing quotas were set for board members among ASAE member and prospect organizations.

Each prospective respondent was sent a letter of notification in advance of the telephone interview. All interviews were conducted by Gallup's own staff of interviewers in Princeton, NJ. A total of 265 executives and 359 volunteer board members were interviewed during the period from October 26 through November 24, 1987.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Given the concern for liability it is somewhat surprising that only about two-thirds of the organizations report carrying director and officer liability insurance. However, it may be noted that seven in ten board members report they are insured either by their company or by a personal liability policy. Volunteer board members are also likely to report the biggest effect of the liability situation is a concern for insurance coverage.

Most voluntary organizations report the cost of liability insurance has increased. In fact, the average reported increase in the past three years is 155%, and one in eight organizations report an increase of over 300%, roughly the equivalent of a 100% increase over 1984 rates per year.

The risk of being sued or being held liable has lead organizations, in some instances, to make changes. About one in twenty report changing the structure of their board of directors, and as many eliminated committees due to the potential exposure to liability risk. A larger proportion (14%) have eliminated programs they believed would expose the organization to risk.

From the volunteer board member's perspective the fear of exposure to liability is seen as resulting in fewer individuals willing to serve as volunteers. About half of the active board members report a decline in volunteers in the past few years. In fact, 16% of the board members report they have withheld their services to an organization out of fear of liability. More common, seven in ten report volunteers are more careful in what they do or say as board members. Related to the greater caution expressed by board members, organizations report establishing policies concerning volunteer activities. Eight in ten organizations have a policy regarding who may speak for the organization and nine in ten give their committees and boards specific charges and authorization and monitor compliance.

While there is a great deal of concern for the risk of liability, only one in twenty organizations report being sued on a directors and officers liability questions in the past five years. However, the response says nothing about the organizations which may have adopted more cautious policies to avoid such situations nor does it indicate the extent to which potential suits may have been averted before filing with the courts. It is of note that almost as many board members as organizations report being sued. It may also be noted that while only about 5% were sued within the past five years, one in four organizations have been sued at some time in the past.

Thus, while the number of organizations reporting problems with liability risk is not great, concern for liability is common. Organizations have taken steps to alter their operations or activities to minimize liability in the face of ever increasing insurance rates and potential risk. Volunteer board members approach the request to serve on an organization's board with caution, investigating the organization's history of lawsuits and its' potential for liability risk. Finally, volunteers are more likely than organization executives to express concern and see a problem affecting the number and quality of volunteers resulting from the liability crisis.

The following is a summary of the findings of interviews with association executives:

CARRYING OF DIRECTOR AND OFFICER LIABILITY INSURANCE

The Questions: To begin, does your organization currently carry director and officer liability insurance coverage?

Does your coverage include exclusions for any of the following? Ethics committee, Standards committee, Peer review, Employee discrimination. When were these exclusions added?

Approximately two-thirds (64%) of all associations surveyed report carrying D&O liability insurance coverage. Among those with liability coverage one in eight (13%) report their insurance has exclusions for ethics or standards committee, peer review or employee discrimination. Typically such exclusions appear to have been imposed on the association's coverage since 1985.

EXTENT TO WHICH COSTS FOR LIABILITY COVERAGE HAVE INCREASED

The Question: Compared with the cost of liability coverage in 1984, by what percentage, if any, have your premiums gone up?

Most associations with D & O coverage report an increase in their premium since 1984. On average, the reported increase is 155%, and the median increase is 54%. Among associations carrying D & O liability insurance about one in four (26%) report their premiums have increased by 100% or more since 1984. Another one in four (23%) have seen their premiums rise by twenty to eighty percent in the past three years. Only one in seven (14%) report no increase. A large percentage of executives could not estimate the extent of change in the cost of their insurance premiums.

CHANGES RESULTING FROM CONCERN WITH LIABILITY RISK

The Questions: Has concern for problems with liability caused your organization to make changes in the structure of your board of directors?

Has your organization eliminated any programs due to potential exposure to liability risk?

Has your organization eliminated any committees due to potential exposure to liability risk?

Relatively few associations (5%) report making changes in the structure of their board of directors as a result of concern for problems of liability. However, a larger proportion (14%) have eliminated programs due to potential exposure to liability risk. The elimination of committee is less common, only 5% report potential exposure to liability risk has lead to the elimination of committees.

While the number of executives reporting liability issues have affected the organization's leadership is relatively small it is noteworthy that such organizations are more likely than others to report changes in board structure or elimination of programs or committees.

Are volunteers prohibited from using association letterhead except when authorized for a specific task, project or purpose?

Do committees and boards have specific charges and authorizations and are they monitored to insure compliance?

A large majority of organizations (80%) have policies concerning communication of the association's views outside the organization. The same proportions report prohibitions on the use of official letterhead except for authorized use.

Nine in ten association executives (90%) also report committees and boards have specific charges and authorizations and are monitored for compliance.

EXPERIENCE WITH LAW SUITS

The Questions: Has your association been sued on a directors and officers liability question in the past five years?

How many times?

When was the last time your organization was sued?

How many suits, if any, have you settled out court within the past five years?

How many suits, if any, have you successfully defended in the past 5 years?

How seriously has your liability coverage been affected by these suits?

Approximately one association in twenty (5 percent) has been sued, within the past five years, on a directors and officers liability question. The majority of organizations have been sued once, but one in four have experienced multiple suits. In addition, it may be noted that about one in four organizations have been sued for some reason at some point in time, including 6 percent who were sued within the past five years for some reason other than D&O liability.

The numbers reporting any involvement in suits is too small to base definite conclusions upon; however, it would appear that about half the suits are settled out of court and most are successfully defended.

EFFECT OF LIABILITY ON RELATIONS WITH CHAPTERS

The Question: Have changes in liability coverage changed relations with chapters of your association?

If yes, in what ways?

Are you able to secure coverage for your chapters?

One in ten (10%) report that changes in liability coverage have changed relations with association chapters. While the number is small it may be of value to look at the changes reported. A third report initiating programs or monitoring to reduce the risk of liability. Others report discontinuing chapters, requiring chapters to pay for their own insurance or increased financial management.

INDEMNIFICATION OF DIRECTORS AND VOLUNTEERS

The Question: Do you indemnify your board of directors in the Bylaws? Do you indemnify your volunteers as well?

A majority of associations (58%) indemnify their board of directors. However, less than half (32%) indemnify volunteers. Organizations with D&O insurance are more likely than others to indemnify board members and volunteers. Those reporting the liability crisis has affected leadership also are more likely to indemnify board members.

EFFECT OF LIABILITY EXPOSURE ON VOLUNTEER LEADERS

The Question: Have any potential volunteer leaders withheld their services to your organization due to concern over liability exposure?

Have any volunteer leaders resigned due to concern over the liability situation?

Has the number of volunteers actively particpating in the leadership of your organization declined as a result of the liability situation in the past three years?

Association executives were asked a series of questions concerning the possible effects of the liability crisis on volunteer leaders. About one in five executives (20%) perceive some change as a result of the potential exposure to liability. The most common effect is the withholding of services to the association. Eighteen percent report that, due to concern over liability exposure, potential leaders withheld their services to the organization. A little less than one in ten (8%) report resignations as a result of concern over liability issues. Related to the reported resignation six percent have seen a decline in the number of volunteers in the past three years related to the liability situation. Finally, seven percent believe the quality of volunteers in their organization has suffered due to liability questions.

Summary of Findings Based on Interviews With Volunteer Board Members

EFFECT OF LIABILITY CRISIS

The Question: Overall, how would you say the liability crisis has affected your participation in not-for-profit organizations?

One in five board members (21%) report the liability situation facing voluntary organizations has made them more concerned about serving on boards of directors. One in ten (10%) either carry insurance or verify that the organization carries liability insurance. A small proportion (3%) have become more selective in their participation and 2% have resigned or refused to serve on a board as a consequence of their concern. However, seven in ten (69%) report no negative effect.

INQUIRIES CONCERNING LIABILITY COVERAGE

The Questions: When asked to volunteer as a board member, do you inquire into the organization's liability coverage before making a decision to serve? Do you research the organization's history of lawsuits before volunteering?

Nearly half (48%) the board members question the organization's liability coverage before making a decision to sit on a board. Perhaps because of their greater experience, or greater potential exposure to suits, those who have been board members for a long period of time or have membership on more than one board are more likely to raise questions about liability before accepting a seat on the board.

Approximately one in four directors (23%) report researching the organization's history of lawsuits prior to volunteering. Again, it is the volunteer with more years of experience or multiple board membership who is most likely to look into the organization's past history.

CRITERIA USED IN RESEARCH OF ORGANIZATION'S HISTORY

The Question: What criteria do you use in your research of an organization's history?

Among those who look into the organization's history the most common approach, taken by about one in four, is to consult with other board members. Almost as many consider the stability of the organization (22%). Slightly less than one in five (17%) consider the quality of the current board members and as many consider the organization's current insurance coverage. The full distribution of factors considered are shown in the table below.

PERCEIVED CHANGES IN VOLUNTEER BOARD MEMBERS

The Questions: In the past few years have you noticed any of the following regarding volunteer board members . . . fewer willing to volunteer or serve? Volunteers are more cautious about what they do or say?

About half the volunteer board members (49%) report that they see fewer willing to volunteer to serve on boards of directors. A much larger proportion (72%) report volunteers are more cautious in what they do or say.

WITHHOLDING OF VOLUNTEER SERVICES

The Question: Have you ever withheld your volunteer services due to fear of liability?

One in six board members (16%) report withholding their services due to fear of liability. Those who serve on several boards, as one might expect, are more likely to report such an experience. It should also be noted that since the survey is of currently active board members there is no measure of the proportion of board members who have completely withdrawn from volunteer activity due to concern for liability.

service. This is particularly true of volunteers who serve on several boards or who have served for a long period of time.

Many more volunteers (62%) report carrying personal liability coverage.

SAMPLING TOLERANCES

In interpreting survey results, it should be borne in mind that all sample surveys are subject to sampling error, that is, the extent to which the results may differ from what would be obtained if the whole population had been interviewed. The size of such sampling errors depends largely on the number of interviews.

The following tables may be used in estimating the sampling error of any percentage in this report. The computed allowances have taken into account the effect of the sample design upon sampling error. They may be interpreted as indicating the range (plus or minus the figure shown) within which the results of repeated samplings in the same time period could be expected to vary, 95 percent of the time, assuming the same sampling procedures, the same interviewers, and the same questionnaire.

The first table shows how much allowance should be made for the sampling error of a percentage:

RECOMMENDED ALLOWANCE FOR SAMPLING ERROR OF A PERCENTAGE

[1] The chances are 95 in 100 that the sampling error is not larger than the figures shown.

The table would be used in the following manner: Let us say a reported percentage is 33 for a group which includes 350 respondents. Then we go to row "percentages near 30" in the table and go across to the column headed "350". The number at this point is 5, which means that the 33 percent obtained in the sample is subject to a sampling error of plus or minus 5 points. Another way of saying it is that very probably (95 chances of 100) the true figure would be somewhere between 28 and 38, with the most likely figure the 33 obtained.

In comparing survey results in two samples, such as, for example, men and women, the question arises as to how large a difference between them must be before one can be reasonably sure that it reflects a real difference. In the tables below, the number of points which must be allowed for in such comparisons is indicated.

Two tables are provided. One is for percentages near 20 or 80; the other for percentages near 50. For percentages in between, the error to be allowed for is between those shown in the two tables.

RECOMMENDED ALLOWANCE FOR SAMPLING ERROR OF THE DIFFERENCE

[In percentage points (at 95 in 100 confidence level) [1]]

Size of sample	175	125	100	75	50	25
	Percentages near 20 or 80
Table A:
125	9	10
100	10	11	11
75	11	11	12	13
50	12	13	14	14	16
25	17	17	18	18	19	22
Table B:
175	10
125	11	12
100	12	13	14
75	14	14	15	16
50	16	16	17	18	20
25	21	21	22	23	24	28

Here is an example of how the tables would be used: Let us say that 55 percent of men responded a certain way and 40 percent of women respond that way also, for a difference of 15 percentage points between them. Can we say with any assurance that the 10-point difference reflects a real difference between men and women on the question? Let us consider a sample which contains approximately 125 men and 125 women.

Since the percentages are near 50, we consult Table B, and since the two samples are 125 persons each, we look for the number 12 here. This means that the allowance for error should be 12 points, and that in concluding that the percentage among men is somewhere between 3 and 27 points higher than the percentage among women we should be wrong only about 5 percent of the time. In other words, we can conclude with considerable confidence that a difference exists in the direction observed and that it amounts to at least 3 percentage points.

If, in another case, men's responses amount to 22 percent, say, and women's 24 percent, we consult Table A because these percentages are near 20. We look for the number in the column headed "125" which is also in the row designated "125" and see that the number is 10. Obviously, then, the two-point difference is inconclusive.●

By Mr. HATFIELD (for himself and Mr. PACKWOOD):

S. 521. A bill to provide for restoration of the Federal trust relationship with, and assistance to the Coquille Tribe of Indians and the individual members consisting of the Coquille Tribe of Indians, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

FEDERAL RECOGNITION OF COQUILLE TRIBE

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today Senator PACKWOOD and I are introducing a bill to extend Federal recognition to the Coquille Tribe of Indians.

The Coquilles were one of 63 Western Oregon tribes to have Federal recognition of their tribal status revoked by operation of the Termination Act of 1954. The tribe is originally from the southern Oregon coast. Despite both termination and the earlier forced relocation of the tribe to the Siletz Indian Reservation some 100 miles away, many of the Coquilles' 527 members still reside in Oregon's southern coastal area.

As quickly became apparent, the Termination Act was a mistake of immense proportions that did serious damage to those tribes affected. At the very time these tribes were struggling to integrate themselves into this country's developing economic system, tribal members were stripped of needed health services and educational benefits. In addition, many lost their land because they were not able to pay the property taxes for which they were suddenly liable.

The Coquilles were no exception. Despite the adversity, however, they have managed to remain a cohesive group and to preserve the customs, tradition, and language of their ancestors. Their unity in the face of tremendous obstacles is nothing short of inspirational. I am happy to report that this bill will complete the process of reinstating Federal recognition to the terminated tribes of Oregon. The Oregon tribes' progress in this area reflects a larger move in our country toward the recognition of three sovereigns in the United States: the Federal Government, State Governments, and Indian nations. It should be noted that this bill not only reestablishes basic program services for the tribe but also will help to restore the tribe's cultural identity—and to give back to the Coquille's the sense of dignity and respect they deserve as an Indian nation.

Mr. President, tremendous support for this measure exists in my State. Oregon Governor Neil Goldschmidt, the State of Oregon Commission on Indian Services, Ecumenical Ministries of Oregon, the Coos County Commissioners, and the Curry County Commissioners all have endorsed this bill. Additional support comes from the tribe's Oregon State Senators, Bill Bradbury and Peg Jolin, numerous churches, the Coos Bay City Council, the Bandon City Council, the Port of Coos Bay, the Port of Bandon, the City of Coquille, and the other Oregon tribes.

The bill Senator PACKWOOD and I are introducing today is identical to legislation introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman PETER DEFAZIO, and it enjoys the support of the entire Oregon delegation. It is my hope that the House will soon approve the Coquille Recognition Act and that

Senate introduction of this bill today will hasten the passage of this long-overdue measure into law.●

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator HATFIELD today in introducing the Coquille Restoration Act. Passage of this bill will be a long overdue act of justice.

The Coquille Tribe is the last to seek restoration of the numerous Oregon tribes terminated by the U.S. Government by two acts of Congress in 1954. Oregon Indians suffered disproportionately under the Termination Acts of 1954. Sixty percent of all the tribes terminated nationwide were Oregon tribes. Sixty-three percent of the Indian land base affected was in Oregon. The consequences of termination were disastrous. The Western Oregon Termination Act ended Federal service to tribal members and led to the removal from trust and eventual sale of all Coquille land.

We now have an opportunity to right this wrong by once again federally recognizing the Coquille Tribe, thereby reinstating Indian health and education services now denied the Coquilles as terminated Indians. Economic development opportunities available to federally recognized Indians would be opened to the Coquilles and make way for development of tribal enterprises. These could provide employment to tribal members and non-Indians and contribute to the overall economy of the region.

The Coquille restoration effort enjoys broad support. All members of the Oregon congressional delegation support the restoration, as does the Governor of the State. The effort is supported by national Indian groups as well as local government, tribes, and businesses.

Mr. President, I hope we can move quickly now to federally recognize the Coquille Tribe so that we can provide its members the opportunity to overcome the adverse effects of 34 years of termination and enjoy the fruits of a government-to government relationship with the United States, a strengthened tribal identity, and economic self-sufficiency.●

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 522. A bill to repeal South African sanctions; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPEAL OF SOUTH AFRICAN SANCTIONS

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to repeal the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986, Public Law 99-440, because the administration of President Bush is entitled to adequate time to formulate its own new approach to an effective and coordinated policy toward South Africa.

The 1986 sanctions legislation was one of the most volatile foreign policy issues during the Reagan Presidency. It was enacted over the President's veto with proponents contending that legislatively-mandated economic sanctions were necessary to persuade South Africa to end its apartheid practices of racial segregation.

The proponents were wrong. Their sanctions did much harm, and no good, for the very people the sanctions were supposed to help. Indeed, more than 2 years of experience make clear that sanctions have been a dismal failure—plainly highly counterproductive—to the stated objectives of sanctions supporters.

Mr. President, with regard to the economy, those who have been most adversely affected by sanctions are the very blacks most Senators and the major news media so piously stated they wished to help. In reality, black workers are now experiencing greater difficulty in finding jobs in what had been a vibrant South African economy—especially in those areas such as agriculture, mining, and textiles that were targetted by the sanctions legislation.

The growth of the black middle class—which is especially evident in certain urban areas around Johannesburg, Pretoria, and Capetown—is being stifled.

These economic setbacks are significant since, in South Africa as elsewhere, economic advances often precede political advance. That had been the historical pattern in South Africa until sanctions were imposed. Indeed, the irony of United States sanctions is that the primary supporters of sanctions within South Africa are those whose avowed desire is to elevate the level of misery in order to promote a revolutionary atmosphere conducive to a Communist takeover.

Similarly, Mr. President, the economic constraint is also reducing the government's ability to maintain or expand its programs to assist blacks. Contrary to the impressions created in the United States, the government of P.W. Botha is regarded in South Africa as the most progressive in its history, providing increasing economic and political gains for black South Africans. Specifically, the government has undertaken an unprecedented program of building and/or subsidizing housing, building new schools and roads. However, all of these are presently constrained as a result of sanctions. Again, the revolutionary elements within South Africa cheer: if progress in improving black conditions can be slowed or stopped, the better for their radical program.

Politically, too, the sanctions legislation has provoked a counterproductive response not anticipated by its supporters. Within South Africa, advocates of maintaining strict apartheid laws have strengthened their political hand at both the national and local levels.

Indeed, the Conservative Party within South Africa—which defends strict apartheid—advanced to become the official opposition, displacing the more liberal Progessive Federal Party which opposes apartheid.

The government's reform program is under assault as providing too many benefits to black areas with not enough concentration on new schools or housing assistance in white areas.

Mr. President, for all these reasons, and others, it is time to recognize the failure of the sanctions approach against South Africa. United States policy should promote equal rights and a peaceful transition to a more representative constitutional form of government for all South Africans. The 1986 sanctions imposed by the U.S. Congress have been a stark contradiction of such policy.

By Mr. ADAMS (for himself and Mr. GORTON):

S. 523. A bill to direct the Secretary of the Army to release a reversionary interest in certain lands in the Port of Benton, WA, which were previously conveyed to the Port of Benton; to the Committee on Armed Services.

RELEASING A REVERSIONARY INTEREST IN CERTAIN LANDS IN THE PORT OF BENTON, WASHINGTON

● Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will remove an obstacle impeding the construction of a Washington State University branch campus in the Tri-Cities area. I would also like to express my appreciation to Senator GORTON for his cosponsoring of this bill.

In 1964, the U.S. Army Corp of Engineers gave the Port of Benton a piece of land. The agreement stipulated that the port only use the land for industrial purposes. Today, the community is planning a 175-acre branch university campus in the area and would like to include a portion of the corp land. This bill will release the port from the original deed restriction and allow the port to donate the land to Washington State University.

The Tri-Cities campus is one of several branch campuses which are planned for construction in Washington State during the future. These campuses will provide access to upper class and graduate university programs for students throughout the State. Currently, Washington has more students enrolled in the first two years of college than most other States. That total drops to below average during the last 2 years of undergraduate school and in graduate programs. There is a strong possibility that the geographical distribution of the universities may be partially responsible for this situation. The construction of branch campuses is one step toward solving that problem. In addition, development of regional branches is expected to encourage economic development in these areas.

Mr. President, passage of this bill is an important start toward expanding the university facility in the Tri-Cities. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 523

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. REVERSIONARY INTEREST.

(a) RELEASE.—Subject to the provisions of this section, the Secretary of the Army shall release to the Port of Benton, Washington, the reversionary interest of the United States over approximately 22 acres of land conveyed in the deed described in subsection (c).

(b) CONDITION OF RELEASE.—The Secretary of the Army shall release the reversionary interest over the approximately 22 acres of land described in subsection (a) on the condition that the Port of Benton donates the land to the Washington State University for the construction of a branch campus. If at any time the Secretary determines that the land is not being used for such purposes, title to such land shall revert to the United States and the United States shall have the immediate right of entry thereon. In the event of any such reversion, title to all improvements made on the land shall vest in the United States without compensation for such improvements.

(c) DEED DESCRIPTION.—The deed referred to in subsection (a) is the quit-claim deed dated June 1, 1964, by which the United States conveyed to the Port of Benton, Washington, approximately 290 acres of land pursuant to section 108 of the River and Harbor Act of 1960 (74 Stat. 486–478).

(d) DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.—The exact acreage and legal description of the land over which the reversionary interest is to be released under this section shall be determined by surveys which are satisfactory to the Secretary of the Army. The cost of any such surveys shall be borne by the Port of Benton. Such land is bordered by the Columbia River to the east, First Street to the north, the Tri-Cities University Center to the south, and the Port of Benton property, which sits east of George Washington Way, to the west.

(e) ADDITIONAL TERMS AND CONDITIONS.—In carrying out the release under this section, the Secretary of the Army may require such additional terms and conditions as the Secretary considers appropriate to protect the interests of the United States.

SEC. 2. DEED AMENDMENT.

The Secretary of the Army is authorized to execute and file an amended deed to reflect the actions carried out under this Act.

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I join with my colleague from the State of Washington, Senator ADAMS, in introducing legislation which will allow the land for a Washington State University branch campus in the Tri-Cities area to be released by the U.S. Army Corp of Engineers to the Port of Benton.

To date, the port is confined to using the land for industrial development as stipulated by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' original agreement. Only Congress can alter the deed restriction in a way to make this transfer possible.

The release of land will enable the city of Richland and Washington State University officials to progress with their plans to build a 175-acre campus in the region.

This legislation is important on two counts: First, like other Western States, Washington has great distances between some key population centers. As a result, the delivery of higher education services has, until now, been uneven among communities.

Second, due to decisions made by the Federal Government regarding the Hanford Nuclear Reservation, the Tri-Cities now must confront with great urgency the need to further diversify its economy. And since the Tri-Cities hosts a highly trained work force dependent heavily on a single industry, new educational services are essential to offering hope and opportunity to this work force and their future employers.

The Washington State University branch campus will ensure that the opportunity for higher education, and the benefits that opportunity provides, are available to the Tri-Cities community well into the future.

It is my hope that all my colleagues in the Senate will recognize the importance of this transaction and enable the Tri-Cities and Washington State University officials to move forward with this branch campus in a timely manner.

While this legislation has the support of the entire Washington State delegation, I would like to express special thanks to my good friend, Congressman SID MORRISON, in whose district this new campus will be built, for his work on this important educational initiative.●

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 524. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for coverage of adult day health care under the Medicare Program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

ADULT DAY HEALTH CARE

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation to help families care for chronically ill relatives at home by providing access to adult day services. Specifically, my legislation would provide up to 100 days of adult day health care each year under the Medicare Part B Program to chronically ill elderly Americans. Joining me in introducing the legislation is the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ]. Similar legislation has been introduced in the House by Congressman PANETTA.

Adult day health care is a community-based program designed to meet the needs of functionally impaired adults. It is a comprehensive program that provides a variety of health, social, and related support services in a protective group setting on a less than 24 hour basis. As such, adult day care is a very real alternative to placement in a nursing home. A multidisciplinary group of professionals provides a wide range of health and health-related services in adult day care centers. These include health monitoring, personal care, meals, nutrition counseling and often physical, speech, and occupational therapy.

Across the Nation, adult day health care programs are gaining increasing popularity as a cost-effective and humane alternative to institutionalization. It is time that Medicare recipients be allowed to share in the benefits of these programs.

Like so many innovative health programs, adult day health care has developed and flourished largely at the grassroots level. The success of these programs has stimulated a rapid growth in the number of day care centers across the United States, from less than a dozen in the early 1970's to about 1,400 centers today. Long waiting lists for nursing homes and large numbers of inappropriate institutional placements provided the impetus in New Jersey for the creation of 70 such centers since 1977. In just 10 years, adult day health care programs have grown in scope and stature across the Nation, providing high quality services to the frail elderly.

Only the lack of a solid funding base limits the growth of adult day health care. The average day care center director must deal with a patchwork quilt of funds, from Medicaid waivers to foundation and corporate grants, in order to support a single program. Yet, Medicare, fearing that any move toward community-based care may increase short-run costs, refuses to recognize adult day health care as a viable, reimbursable service.

Mr. President, this attitude is shortsighted and unwise. Adult day health care can prevent more costly admissions to nursing homes. When day care services are directed to those most at risk of institutionalization, public agencies have actually saved tax dollars.

Besides its cost, nursing home care can be traumatic and disruptive to family relationships and to elderly independence. In fact, whenever I ask elderly citizens in New Jersey and around the country where they want to be cared for, the overwhelming response I get is that they prefer the dignity of independent living in their own communities, as long as that is possible.

Mr. President, some people fear that an expansion in adult day health care will discourage family caregiving. But we know that families always have been and will remain the primary caregivers for the elderly, regardless of other sources of care. Unfortunately, some family members have been forced to give up their jobs and other family responsibilities in order to assume this caregiving role. This may simply not be possible for families that need two incomes to make ends meet. Adult day health care can make that possible. It can help avoid placing loved ones in an institution when care during working hours could avoid it. In these cases, day care can actually help preserve the American tradition of family caregiving by acting as a complement, rather than a replacement to family support.

There are also significant numbers of elderly with no family, friends, or caregivers to turn to, whose basic needs simply go unmet. The GAO recently estimated that nearly 1.5 million elderly citizens do without the help they need to get out of bed, to bathe, and to perform other basic daily activities.

Clearly, many senior citizens are forced to rely on nursing homes simply because it is the only option available. A recent study concluded that a majority of nursing home residents are institutionalized not for medical reasons, but because their families no longer have the energy or resources to care for them. There must be alternatives; stable funding is needed to allow an expansion in community-based services, like adult day health care. Medicare should be at the forefront of the movement to encourage the growth of these alternative services.

Mr. President, the bill that I am introducing today provides up to 100 days each year of adult day health care under Medicare for functionally impaired elderly who would normally require institutional care. Beneficiaries would be subject to a $5 daily copayment. To ensure that these services are appropriate, day care would have to be authorized in advance by an independent screening team of health professionals on a case-by-case basis. Further, a multidisciplinary team within each center would assess the continuing need for particular services.

Because we wish to assure the highest quality of care in these centers, our bill requires that all adult day health care centers that receive Medicare reimbursement under this program be certified and inspected. As part of the certification process, programs would have to demonstrate that they are equipped to meet the health and health-related needs of all participants. In addition, Medicare would conduct annual, unannounced inspections of certified centers to assess on ongoing basis the quality of services provided.

Mr. President, adult day health care can help bridge the widening gap between independence and long-term institutionalization. It is time that Medicare formally recognizes this important service. Elderly Americans need and deserve every opportunity to stay independent as long as possible. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.●

By Mr. BAUCUS:

S. 527. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to reclassify certain hospitals as sole community hospitals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

SOLE COMMUNITY HOSPITAL PRESERVATION ACT

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Sole Community Hospital Preservation Act of 1989, a bill that guarantees adequate access to health care to rural Americans.

We cannot wait to provide this guarantee. The financial pressures on access critical hospitals are building, and corrective action is needed during the 101st Congress to avert a human and economic disaster in rural America.

To understand how we have come to this precipice, it is important to remember that the Medicare Prospective Payment System [PPS] was designed to increase hospital efficiency and reduce costs, not improve, or maintain, access to health care. With this in mind, let's examine the consequences, both good and bad, that have taken place as a result of the move from Medicare cost-based reimbursement to prospective payment.

Considering its goals, PPS has been exceedingly successful. Indeed, a recent report in the New England Journal of Medicine by Dr. Alice Rivlin of Rutgers University, estimates that in 1990 PPS will reduce hospital insurance trust fund payments by $18 billion. This represents a significant contribution to our important job of cutting the Federal budget deficit.

PPS has accomplished this efficiency by careful peer review to reduce hospital admissions, and by providing an averaged per-case payment that allows Congress to establish Medicare's annual expenditure for hospitals in advance. However, for this averaged payment to be equitable, for example, to average reimbursement losers and winners, a hospital must maintain an adequate patient volume. When volume is low a few high-cost cases make hospitals lose money. They are inefficient.

In a competitive health care environment, particularly when 50 percent or more of a hospital's discharges are paid for by Medicare, the consequences of inefficiency can be harsh. These consequences include progressive reduction of capital reserves, inability to acquire new technology, physician dissatisfaction with services leading to a further reduction of admissions, and ultimately, bankruptcy and closure.

Over the past 4 years 233 hospitals have closed nationwide, more than half in rural areas.

When we are told that there may be 300,000 excess hospital beds in this country, is the closure of a hospital a bad thing? Well, we need to define what we mean by bad.

Let's say the hospital is in Chicago, a city with a population of about 3,010,000 and a metropolitan area of 228 square miles. Chicago has 47 hospitals or about one hospital for every 5 square miles. If a hospital closes in Chicago, patients can just go down the street to another facility. Their staff will be hired by other hospitals. The biggest transportation block to access is the crosstown traffic.

Now if this is an inner city hospital, and the patients are without health insurance, there could be problems; or, if the hospital is investor-owned, the investors will lose money. In general, however, access to care will not be jeopardized.

But let's say the hospital is in Montana. My State has about 809,000 residents spread out over 145,392 square miles. There are 60 acute care hospitals or 1 hospital for every 2,423 square miles.

Of these 60 hospitals, 54 are the sole provider in the town. The average bed size for these 54 hospitals is 36. If the 41-bed hospital in Lewistown, MT closed, folks in Fergus County might have to go upwards of 100 miles to the next nearest hospital. The staff can't be reemployed, so they move away. When people move away, the economy of the town atrophies.

Access critical hospitals are not unique to Montana. Most States have at least one. It's just that most hospitals in Montana qualify as access critical or frontier hospitals. Mr. President, Congress needs to recognize the price of efficiency to the people who live in towns like Circle, MT. When these hospitals close, the problem is not that investors lose money. The problem is that people lose access to care, and, perhaps, people die.

Now the folks living in rural America are good people who generally don't like to complain. Many would just as soon be left alone by government to work out their own problems. As long as they're getting an even shake. But they aren't.

I have looked long and hard at the Medicare laws. Nowhere can I find any suggestion in the law that a senior, who diligently contributes to the Medicare trust fund but who happens to live in rural America, is to be penalized by less adequate access to health care than a fellow American who lives in a city. I believe that these little hospitals have become a rounding error in the Medicare budget, a budget asterisk that is too easy for some in government to ignore.

But I and many of my colleagues are not going to let rural health care be ignored any longer.

I am pleased to be a cosponsor of the Equity for Rural Hospitals Act of 1989. This important piece of legislation, introduced earlier this year, aims to correct the historical inequities in Medicare reimbursement of urban and rural hospitals. This is long overdue, but will require several years to accomplish. During this transition period, the bill tries to protect rural hospitals with less than 100 beds, but with very high—70 percent—Medicare utilization, against losses. Although it's a good start, I don't believe it goes far enough to identify or preserve rural sole community—access critical—hospitals.

The definition of sole community hospital that is now used in Medicare is, I believe, too restrictive, and as a consequence many hospitals that are critical for access are not being identified. The two most commonly used inclusion criteria demand a 50-mile distance from the next closest facility or a 25-mile distance and a 75 percent Medicare market share. Few hospitals fulfill these criteria. The regulations are not sensitive to the limitations on travel by the sick elderly, many who need rapid access during poor weather conditions.

A recent study for PROPAC by SysteMertrics demonstrated the difficulty that many access critical hospitals have in fulfilling the current definitions. The study found that modestly reducing the distance and market share requirements could increase the number of eligible hospitals to 506 from the current 318. I have incorporated these changes into the Sole Community Preservation Act of 1989.

Simply incorporating more access critical hospitals into the definition of sole community hospitals, however, is not enough. In making the judgment that access to these hospitals is critical, the Federal Government must fulfill its obligation to Medicare beneficiaries. This obligation can only be fulfilled if the Medicare payment system itself does not foster the downhill slide to bankruptcy. Therefore, for these hospitals, my bill would mandate that Medicare pay all reasonable costs for hospitals that are losing money under the current system.

Will this protection against loss solve all the problems of small hospitals?

The bill won't bring a doctor to an isolated community, and without a doctor these hospitals close. But we will be working in other ways to foster change in the Medicare physician reimbursement system that will provide greater incentives for physicians to provide primary care in rural America. That reform will help rural hospitals and the people they serve.

The bill won't start new businesses to expand the population base of rural America so that the low hospital census will improve. Again, I will be working my hardest to improve the economic base that hospitals ultimately need to survive.

What the bill does is level the playing field, so that Medicare isn't actively accelerating the demise of these critical access facilities. That is a significant step in the right direction, a step to ensure access to health care for rural communities.

I urge my colleagues to review this legislation carefully and to join me in supporting these needed changes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Sole Community Hospital Preservation Act of 1989 be printed following my statement. I would also like to include an article from the Great Falls Tribune: "Medicare's Set Fees Create Moral, Fiscal Dilemma."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 527

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Sole Community Hospital Preservation Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. CLASSIFICATION OF SOLE COMMUNITY HOSPITALS.

(a) CRITERIA FOR CLASSIFICATION.—Section 1886(d)(5)(C) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ww(d)(5)(C)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating clauses (iii) and (iv) as clauses (iv) and (v), respectively;

(2) by redesignating the last sentence of clause (ii) as clause (iii) and realigning it accordingly;

(3) in clauses (iii), as redesignated, by striking "this subparagraph" and inserting in lieu thereof "clause (ii)";

(4) by inserting "(I)" after the designation of clause (iii), as redesignated; and

(5) by adding at the end of clause (iii), as redesignated, the following:

"(II) In making determinations pursuant to subclause (i), the Secretary shall treat a subsection (d) hospital as a sole community hospital if the hospital is located more than 35 miles from other hospitals furnishing short-term, acute care.

"(III) In making determinations pursuant to subclause (I), the Secretary shall treat a subsection (d) hospital as a sole community hospital if the hospital is located at least 25 miles (but not more than 35 miles) from other hospitals furnishing short-term, acute care and not more than 50 percent of the individuals entitled to benefits under part A who become hospital inpatients in the service area of the hospital are admitted to other hospitals furnishing such care within a 35-mile radius of the hospital, or if the service area of the hospital is larger, within the service area of the hospital. For purposes of the preceding sentence, a hospital with fewer than 50 beds shall be treated as meeting the requirement relating to the percentage of individuals becoming inpatients of other hospitals if the appropriate agency or organization with an agreement under section 1816 certifies that the hospital would have met the requirement were it not for the fact that some individuals were forced to seek care outside the service area of the hospital due to the unavailability of necessary specialty services at the hospital.

"(IV) In making determinations pursuant to subclause (I), the Secretary shall treat a subsection (d) hospital as a sole community hospital if the hospital is located at least 25 miles (but not more than 35 miles) from other hospitals furnishing short-term, acute care and such other hospitals are inaccessible for at least one month each year because of local topography or severe weather conditions.".

(b) DURATION OF CLASSIFICATION.—For purposes of section 1886(d)(5)(C)(ii)), any hospital that is classified as a sole community hospital on the date of the enactment of this Act shall continue to be so classified until—

(1) there is a change in the circumstances under which the classification was approved, or

(2) the hospital requests cancellation of such classification and such cancellation becomes effective.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to applications submitted on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. PAYMENTS TO SOLE COMMUNITY HOSPITALS.

Section 1886(d)(5)(C)(ii) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ww(d)(5)(C)(ii)), as amended by section 2(a) of this Act is further amended by inserting after the first sentence the following: "For cost reporting periods beginning on or after October 1, 1989, the Secretary shall provide for an appropriate adjustment to ensure that the total amount paid to a sole community hospital for the operating costs of inpatient hospital services for inpatient hospital discharges in that cost reporting period are not less than the reasonable costs incurred by the hospital in furnishing such services (determined without regard to the limits imposed by subsections (a) and (b)).".

SEC. 4. TECHNICALS AMENDMENTS.

Section 1886(d)(5)(C)(ii) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ww(d)(5)(C)(ii)), as amended by sections 2(a) and 3 of this Act, is further amended—

(1) by inserting "(I)" after "(ii)"; and

(2) by redesignating the third, fourth, and fifth sentences as subclauses (II), (III), and (IV), respectively, and indenting and realigning each such subclause accordingly.

MEDICARE'S SET FEES CREATE MORAL, FISCAL DILEMMA

SHELBY—Last summer, Grace Luebke spent her last 40 days in the Toole County Hospital, enduring the fierce pain of a cancer that was slowly killing her.

Her physician determined that because of her unusual condition and the constant care and medication Luebke needed, the 71-year-old could not be sent home to die.

After her death, the hospital totaled her bills and submitted a claim of $15,592 to Medicare, which was the only means Luebke had of paying for her health care. But Medicare sent the hospital only $3,247 on the grounds that most people who have Luebke's type of pancreatic cancer are in the hospital an average of six days before they die, according to Warren Bartelson, Shelby hospital administrator.

"We couldn't kick her out; she was dying and needed care," Bartelson said. "But she was a Medicare patient and that meant we'd have to take the loss."

Bartelson said hospital administrators are put "in a real uncomfortable position" when they keep patients longer than Medicare's set average stay. He said even though the patient needs the care, the hospital will "most certainly" lose money.

The Montana Hospital Association reports that hospitals in the state lost more than $18 million in 1987 for uncompensated care, much of it from insufficient Medicare reimbursements.

"I don't think it's an exaggeration to say that we have a crisis here and that Medicare has a role in it," said Jim Ahrens, executive director of the MHA.

Established by the federal government in 1965 to cover the medical costs of people over age 65 and for some others who receive Social Security disability benefits, Medicare is the only source of health insurance for a growing number of older Americans.

Reacting to skyrocketing health costs in 1983, Medicare began standardizing the amount it would reimburse doctors and hospitals for different types of medical procedures and care. It also established separate rates for rural and urban hospitals, paying 14 to 40 percent less to smaller facilities than what it pays larger facilities for the same care.

Hospital administrators say the problem is twofold: Reimbursement rates have not kept pace with actual costs and the rural differential is placing an unfair burden on small hospitals.

Medicare accounts for about 45 percent of the patients in the Shelby hospital, which is about average in Montana, according to the MHA. Last year, Medicare payments to Shelby were $170,000 less than the actual costs for Medicare patients, Bartelson said.

"You accept what Medicare pays, period," he said. "That $170,000 was an out-of-pocket loss for us, I'd say the major reason this hospital lost money last year was because of Medicare."

Les Urvand, administrator of the Phillips County Hospital in Malta, added that the problem is made worse by all the paperwork demanded by Medicare.

"When you are reimbursed a dollar, it's not a real dollar because 15 or 20 cents of it is spent on paperwork proving you're spending the money right," said Urvand, whose hospital costs were more than $100,000 above Medicare reimbursements last year.

Urvand and Bartelson both said most hospitals have been forced to hire additional staff merely to process the paperwork required by Medicare.

A recent study by the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging bears out those contentions, concluding that "Medicare's reimbursement policies have contributed to eroding the financial viability of rural hospitals."

The study said the level of insurance coverage in rural areas has traditionally been low. That, combined with low occupancy rates, gives rural hospitals less ability to subsidize losses from Medicare patients with revenue from private pay patients.

The study recommends immediate elimination of the rural-urban differential. It said that although some hospitals may be forced to close or change their services "those decisions * * * are appropriately made by the rural community itself. They should not result from discriminatory, inappropriate or misguided Medicare reimbursement policies."

In a more far-reaching proposal, the study suggests that when a hospital is the sole health facility in a community, it be reimbursed for actual costs.

The report also suggests Congress establish a clearinghouse for rural health service research, and it recommends the National Center for Health Services Research get $10 million to research rural health.

The issue may be resolved in court before Congress has a chance to make changes. Late last year, the National Rural Health Association filed suit in Washington, D.C., challenging "the unreasonably low Medicare reimbursement to rural hospitals."

According to Robert Van Hook, executive director of the organization, the lawsuit was filed as "a sign of our commitment to solving a problem that may force up to 600 hospitals to close their doors in the next few years."

In Montana, it is unknown how many hospitals face the prospect of closure because of Medicare shortages, says Ahrens of the MHA. But he said the issue is a "hot one" with financially strapped hospital administrators.

"We haven't got much time to revitalize the system," Ahrens said. "Many hospitals in this state are in trouble and not all of them will survive."●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. GARN):

S. 530. A bill to enhance competition in the financial services sector, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION AFFILIATION ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, dramatic changes in both the domestic and international financial environments have brought us to the point where it is no longer relevant to discuss whether we should undertake major reform of the legal structure of the financial services industry. These changes make reform imperative. The question is how do we go about it.

In introducing the Depository Institution Affiliation Act, Senator CRANSTON and I reaffirm our commitment to comprehensive, fair, forward-thinking reform of the law governing the financial services industry. We propose a new order that will improve the safety and soundness of the Nation's financial system and increase the availability of innovative financial products and services for consumers, business, and government at the lowest possible cost.

The system of finance established in the 1930's and strengthened in 1956 by the Bank Holding Company Act was designed to restrict competition among the various sectors of the industry and enhance the safety of the financial instruments. Financial services, therefore, were compartmentalized and separated to achieve the twin goals of insulation and stability.

Today, however, due to unforeseen technological advances and the primacy of history over reason in the formation of our current bank regulatory system, today's patchwork of financial law is inherently unstable and anticompetitive. Furthermore, the existing protection for local industries have served to undermine the efficient delivery of services and the competitive position of U.S. financial institutions in the world market.

The time has come for a broader debate, one focused upon clear national priorities: stability, domestic competition, and foreign competitiveness. More specifically, the time has come for an alternative legal and regulatory structure that permits the free market rather than governmental inertia to determine whether any type of business is compatible with ownership of a depository institution. It is time for the efficient, rationally integrated American financial services companies to compete in the global financial services industry.

The Cranston-D'Amato banking bill would create a new holding company structure which will: (1) Permit diversification of strong financial services companies into related businesses; (2) open up new sources of capital for the banking and thrift industries; (3) strengthen and rationalize regulation; (4) insulate depository institutions from the risks of their subsidiaries; (5) promote the interest of consumers through promoting cross-marketing of financial services; and (6) enhance public confidence in the financial services industry.

Mr. President, this is an idea whose time has come. Those of us who have been involved in this issue over the past decade have witnessed a regrettable inability to achieve a consensus because the Congress and past officials of the Treasury Department have lacked the vision to proceed to the comprehensive approach embodied in this bill. We have witnessed, and participated, in debate focused on banking deregulation, expanded bank powers and expanded range of bank products. This debate has pitted the banks against securities companies, against insurance agents and against real estate brokers. It has been an unproductive discussion: the result of talking about small issues.

Through this bill Senator CRANSTON and I seek to focus the debate on the larger and increasingly pressing issues of international competitiveness, consumer benefit, and efficient use of financial resources.

An additional and important aspect of this legislation is the breadth of support behind it. Many types of companies from many parts of the country are part of a forward-looking, global-minded coalition which supports this legislation. Still more significant is the support of the bill's first original cosponsor. And I now ask unanimous consent for the addition of my distinguished colleague from Utah, Senator JAKE GARN as an original cosponsor of the Depository Institution, Affiliation Act. Senator GARN, the ranking Republican Member of the Banking Committee and former chairman of that committee, has participated over long years in the debate over banking reform. His cosponsorship of this bill is a bellwether event in the progress toward genuine and comprehensive reform of the financial services industry.

Mr. President, I look forward to the day when we are again on the floor to take up comprehensive financial reform legislation and I solicit the support of all my colleagues to that end.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION AFFILIATION ACT—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1: Short Title.

Section 1 provides that this Act be cited as the "Depository Institution Affiliation Act".

Section 2: Findings and Purpose.

Congress finds that current laws and regulations restrain efficiency, competition and innovation in the design and delivery of financial services to the disadvantage of consumers. Congress also finds that restrictions on ownership of depository institutions and affiliations with other business organizations interferes with their ability to attract and retain capital and managerial resources. In addition, Congress finds that the vulnerability of the financial system and its discrete components is increased and effective monitoring, supervision and coordination of actions during periods of stress is impeded by fragmented and disparate regulation. Finally, Congress finds that current laws inhibit the ability of domestic financial markets and intermediaries to respond to the serious competitive challenges presented by foreign intermediaries and the globalization of markets.

The purpose of this Act is to promote the safety and soundness of the nation's financial system, enhance the quality of regulation and supervision of financial intermediaries and achieve a more efficient market and effective regulatory structure. To accomplish this objective, the Act would establish an alternative and comprehensive legislative framework for the creation and regulation of depository institution holding companies. The Act would increase the capital adequacy of commercial banks, brokers and dealers, and savings and loan associations and other financial companies by eliminating restrictions on common ownership and affiliation within a depository institution holding company. The Act would permit affiliates to engage in any activity subject to functional and equal regulation by the appropriate state or federal regulator. In addition, the Act insulates and protects insured depository institutions through higher capital requirements, expanded restrictions on relationships with affiliates, broader examination and enforcement authority and severe civil and criminal penalties. Finally, the Act permits the efficient marketing and distribution of financial services to consumers subject to safeguards against coercive tie-ins and other unfair and abusive practices and establishes the National Financial Services Committee to oversee the evolution and supervision of the financial services industry and to report to Congress.

TITLE I—CREATION AND CONTROL OF DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION HOLDING COMPANIES

Section 101. This section creates a new type of financial company, a depository institution holding company (DIHC), and sets out the terms and conditions under which such a company can be established and must be operated.

Subsection (a) Definitions. This subsection defines terms used in this section.

Paragraph (a)(1) defines a DIHC to be any company that files a notice with the National Financial Services Committee (see Title II of this Act) that it intends to comply with the provisions of this section, and controls an insured bank or insured institution, or, either (i) has, within the preceding 12 months filed a notice under subsection (b) of this section to establish or acquire control of a federally insured bank or thrift or a company owning such a bank or thrift, or (ii) controls a company which, within the preceding 12 months, has filed an application for FDIC or FSLIC deposit insurance, provided that such notice or application has not been disapproved by the appropriate Federal regulatory agency or withdrawn. Any bank holding company that elects to become a depository institution holding company, and which does not control any banks that are not FDIC insured, will lose its status as a bank holding company immediately upon filing the notice of its election to become a DIHC. Similarly, a savings and loan holding company that elects to become a DIHC will lose that status upon filing the notice of its election to become a DIHC. To assure that each bank controlled by a DIHC would be subject to regulation and supervision by an appropriate federal regulatory agency, owners of uninsured banks would not be able to avail themselves of the opportunity to become a DIHC, unless they agreed to convert such uninsured banks into insured banks or insured institutions.

Paragraph (a)(2) gives the term "bank holding company" the meaning given to it in Section 2(a) of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, as amended.

Paragraph (a)(3) gives the term "savings and loan holding company" the meaning given to it in section 408(a) of the National Housing Act.

Paragraph (a)(4) defines for this section, except paragraph (5) of subsection (f), the term "affiliate" of a company as any company which controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with such a company.

Paragraph (a)(5) defines the term "appropriate Federal regulatory agency" (AFRA). For national banks and for District banks the AFRA is the Comptroller of the Currency. For state-chartered member banks the AFRA is the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. For state-chartered, non-member banks (except District banks) the AFRA is the Board of Directors of the FDIC. For insured institutions the AFRA is the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Paragraph (a)(6) gives the term "insured bank" the meaning given to it in section 3(h) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act.

Paragraph (a)(7) gives the term "State" the meaning given to it in section 3(a) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act.

Paragraph (a)(8) defines the term "insured institution" to be a Federal savings and loan association, a Federal savings bank, a building and loan, savings and loan or homestead association or a cooperative bank, the accounts of which are insured by the FSLIC. In addition, the term "insured institution" also includes an FDIC-insured federal savings bank and any savings bank deemed by the FSLIC to be an insured institution under section 408(n) of the National Housing Act.

Paragraph (a)(9) defines the term "company" to mean any corporation, partnership, business trust, association or similar organization. However, corporations that are majority owned by the United States or any State are excluded from the definition of company.

Paragraph (a)(10) defines control by one company over another. For purposes of this section, the term "control" means the power, directly or indirectly, to direct the management or policies of a company, or to vote 25% or more of any class of voting securities of a company.

There are three exceptions from the definition of control. These pertain to ownership of voting securities acquired or held:

1. as agent, trustee or in some other fiduciary capacity;

2. as underwriter for such a period of time as will permit the sale of these securities on a reasonable basis; or in connection with or incidental to market making, dealing, trading, brokerage or other securities-related activities, provided that such shares are not acquired with a view toward acquiring, exercising or transferred control of the management or policies of the company;

3. for the purpose of securing or collecting a prior debt until two years after the date of the acquisition; and

In addition, no company formed for the sole purpose of proxy solicitation shall be deemed to be in control of another company by virtue of its acquisition of the voting rights of the other company's securities.

Paragraph (a)(11) defines the term "minimum required capital" to be the amount of capital that is required for an insured bank or insured institution, as applicable, under Federal law or regulation.

Subsection (b): Changes in Control of Insured Banks and Insured Institutions. This subsection provides that any DIHC wishing to acquire control of an insured bank or company owning such bank must comply with the requirements of the Change in Bank Control Act, and that any DIHC wishing to acquire an insured institution or company owning such institution must comply with the requirements of the Change in Savings and Loan Control Act. Failure to comply with these requirements will subject the relevant DIHC to the penalties and procedures provided in subsections (i) through (m) of this section, in addition to otherwise applicable penalties.

Subsection (c): Affiliate Transactions. This subsection authorized supplemental regulation of the transactions of insured banks and insured institutions controlled by DIHCs with their affiliates. These regulations would be in addition to the restrictions on interaffiliate transactions provided for under sections 23A or 23B of the Federal Reserve Act and section 415 of the National Housing Act (see Title III of this Act). This subsection gives each AFRA the flexibility to promulgate and adapt rules and regulations in response to changing market conditions so that the AFRA has at all times the capability to prevent insured banks and insured institutions under its supervision that are controlled bh DIHCs from engaging in transactions that would compromise the safety and soundness of such insured banks or insured institutions or that would jeopardize the deposit insurance funds. In addition, this subsection would provide specific interaffiliate transactions as follows:

1. The bank cannot lend to its securities affiliate (except to make fully secured intraday loans for the purpose of clearing government securities).

2. The bank cannot make loans or guarantees to a company in order to enhance the marketability of the company's securities that are being underwritten by the bank's securities affiliate.

3. The bank cannot make a loan to a company for the purpose of repaying the principal or interest on securities underwritten by its securities affiliate.

4. The securities affiliate cannot sell securities to the bank or its trust accounts during the underwriting period or for 30 days thereafter.

Moreover, other provisions of this Act assure that the AFRA will have the capability to enforce these regulations vigorously (subsection (i) of this section) and that any violations of these regulations will be more severely punished than violations of regulations applicable to insured banks and insured institutions that are not controlled by DIHCs (subsections (i), (j), (k), and (l) of this section).

Subparagraph (c)(1)(A) empowers the AFRA to develop rules and regulations to prevent insured banks and insured institutions under its supervision that are also controlled by a DIHC from engaging in unsafe or unsound practices involving the DIHC or any of its affiliates, including unsafe and unsound practices that may arise in connection with transactions covered by sections 23A and 23B of the Federal Reserve Act.

Subparagraph (c)(1)(B) empowers the AFRA to create certain exceptions to the provisions of the preceding subparagraph, if the AFRA deems that such exceptions are reasonable and in the public interest and not inconsistent with the purposes of this Act. These exemptions may relate to certain institutions or classes or institutions, or to certain transactions or classes of transactions, including transactions covered under section 23A or 23B of the Federal Reserve Act.

Paragraph (c)(2) provides that any rules adopted under subparagraph (c)(2)(A) shall be issued in accordance with normal rulemaking procedures and shall afford interested parties the opportunity to comment in writing and orally on any proposed rule.

Paragraph (c)(3) grandfathers interaffiliate transactions approved by a Federal regulatory agency prior to the enactment of this Act, exempting them from rules and regulations promulgated under subparagraph (c)(2)(A).

Paragraph (c)(4) makes it clear that sections 23A and 23B of the Federal Reserve Act will apply to every insured bank and insured institution controlled by a depository institution holding company.

Subsection (d): Capitalization. This subsection regulates the capitalization of insured banks and insured institutions that are controlled by a DIHC.

Paragraph (d)(1) provides a higher capital requirement for insured banks and institutions that are part of a depository institution holding company. It provides further that if the AFRA finds that an insured bank or insured institution subsidiary of a DIHC does not meet the minimum capital requirements applicable to it, the DIHC shall have thirty days to reach an agreement with the AFRA concerning how and according to what schedule the insured bank or insured institution will bring its minimum capital back into conformance with requirements. During that time the insured bank or insured institution shall operate under the close supervision of the AFRA.

In the event that the DIHC does not reach an agreement within thirty days with the AFRA on how and according to what schedule the capital of the insured bank or insured institution will be replenished, the DIHC will be required to divest the insured bank or insured institution in an orderly manner within a period of six months, or such additional period of time as the AFRA may determine is reasonably required in order to effect such divestiture.

In view of the enhanced regulatory control over insured banks and insured institutions controlled by DIHCs, paragraph (d)(2) states that no AFRA may regulate the capital of the DIHC. Thus, no AFRA may require the DIHC to enter into any other agreement regarding the maintenance of capital in its insured bank or insured institution affiliates. The capital of the DIHC would, however, be regulated by any other agency having jurisdiction over it. For example, if the DIHC were also a registered broker/dealer, it would have to conform to the minimum capital requirements mandated by the SEC.

Subsection (e): Interstate Acquisitions of Insured Banks and Insured Institutions. This subsection subjects interstate acquisitions of an insured bank by a DIHC to the same restrictions as those applicable to bank holding companies under section 3(d) of the Bank Holding Company act of 1956, as amended, and it subjects interstate acquisitions of an insured institution by a DIHC to the same restrictions as those applicable to savings and loan holding companies.

Subsection (f): Differential Treatment Prohibition; Laws Inconsistent With This Act. This subsection does two things. First, it prohibits adversely differential treatment of DIHCs and their affiliates, including their insured bank and insured institution affiliates except as this Act specifically provides. Second, this subsection ensures that state and federal initiatives do not undermine achievement of the purposes of this Act. Whether couched as affiliation, licensing or agency restrictions or as constraints on access to state courts, such laws effectively perpetuate market barriers and deny consumers the opportunity to choose between different financial products and services.

Notwithstanding any other federal law, Paragraph (f)(1) prohibits states from enacting laws that discriminate against DIHCs or against their affiliates, including their insured bank and insured institution affiliates. This paragraph also prohibits, notwithstanding any other federal law, federal and state regulatory agencies from discriminating by rule, regulation, order or any other means against DIHCs or against their affiliates, including their insured bank or insured institution affiliates except as this Act specifically provides. This is intended to assure that the primary purpose of this Act—the enhancement of competition in the depository institution sector—will be fulfilled.

Paragraph (f)(2) finds that certain State affiliation and licensing laws restrain legitimate competition in interstate commerce, deny consumers freedom of choice in selecting a depository institution and threaten the long-term safety and soundness of insured banks and insured institutions by denying them access to capital. Often based in whole or part on prior articulations of federal law, conflicting state laws take a variety of forms. Some prohibit an insurance company affiliated with an insured bank or insured institution from obtaining a license to do business in the state. See, e.g., Pa. State. Ann. titl. 40 Sec. 281(b) (Purdon Supp. 1986) (denying admittance or licensing of such affiliates except for certain limited credit and title insurance activities). Others deny licenses to employees and agents representing insurance companies affiliated with insured banks and insured institutions. See e.g., Fla. Stat. Sec. 626.988(c)(2) (1985) (except for certain credit insurance activities). Still others prohibit a life insurance company from organizing or acquiring a bank, thrift or finance company subsidiary. N.Y. Ins. Sec. 1701 (McKinney Sup. 1987). If DIHCs are actually to meet the array of diverse consumer financial needs, and if the procompetitive policies and priorities espoused by this Act are to be made applicable on a nationwide basis, such state market barriers must necessarily yield.

Accordingly, this paragraph preempts any provision of federal or state law, rule, regulation or order that is expressly or impliedly inconsistent with the purposes of this section. The preempted statutes include without limitation, state banking, savings and loan, insurance, real estate, securities, finance company, retail or other laws which restrict the affiliation of insured banks and insured institutions or their owners, agents, principals, brokers, directors, officers, employees or other representatives with other firms. Similarly, laws prohibiting cross marketing of products and services are preempted insofar as such cross marketing activities are conducted by DIHCs, their affiliates or by any agent, principal, broker, director, officer, employee or other representative. By contrast, nondiscriminatory state approval, examination, supervisory, regulatory, reporting, licensing, and similar requirements are not affected.

Paragraph (f)(3) removes a common uncertainty under state licensing and qualification to do business statutes, which leaves an out-of-state insured bank's or insured institution's access to another state's courts unresolved. Under this provision, so long as such a bank or insured institution limits its activities to those which do not constitute the establishment or operation of a "domestic branch" of an insured bank in that other state, it can qualify to maintain or defend in that state's court any action which could be maintained or defended by a company which is not an insured bank or insured institution and is not located in that state, subject to the same filing, fee and other conditions as may be imposed on such a company. This paragraph is not intended to grant states any power that they do not currently have to regulate the activities of out-of-state insured banks or insured institutions.

Paragraph (f)(4) makes clear that a state may not impede or prevent any insured bank or insured institution affiliated with a DIHC or any DIHC or affiliate thereof from marketing products and services in that state by utilizing and compensating its agents, solicitors, brokers, employees and other persons located in that state and representing such a bank, institution, company, or affiliate. However, to the extent such persons are performing loan origination, deposit solicitation or other activities in which an insured bank or insured institution may engage, those activities cannot constitute the establishment or operation of a "domestic branch" at any location other than the main or branch offices of the insured bank or insured institution.

Paragraph (f)(5) contains a special definition of "affiliate" and "control" for purposes of paragraphs (2) through (4) this subsection only. Control is deemed to occur where a person or entity owns or has the power to vote 10% of the voting securities of another entity or where a person or entity directly or indirectly determines the management or policies of another entity or person. Unlike the definition of affiliate set forth in paragraph (4) of subsection (a), this definition encompasses not only corporate affiliations but affiliations between corporations and individuals.

Subsection (g): Securities, Insurance and Real Estate Activities of Insured Banks and Insured Institutions. In order to facilitate functional regulation of the activities of DIHCs this section prohibits insured banks and insured institutions controlled by DIHCs from conducting certain securities, insurance and real estate activities currently permissible for some insured banks and insured institutions.

Paragraph (g)(1)(A) provides that no insured bank or insured institution controlled by a DIHC shall directly engage in dealing in or underwriting securities, or purchasing or selling securities as agent, except to the extent such activities are performed only with regard to obligations of the United States or are the type of activities that could be performed by a national bank's trust department (12 U.S.C. 92a).

Paragraph (g)(1)(B) provides that no insured bank or insured institution controlled by a DIHC shall directly engage in insurance underwriting.

Paragraph (g)(1)(C) provides that no insured bank or insured institution controlled by a DIHC shall directly engage in real estate investment or development except insofar as these activities are incidental to the insured bank's or insured institution's investment in or operation of its own premises, result from foreclosure on collateral securing a loan, or are the type of activities that could be performed by a national bank's trust department.

Paragraph (g)(2) clarifies that nothing in this subsection shall be construed (A) to prohibit or impede a DIHC or any of its affiliates (other than an insured bank or insured institution) from engaging in any of the activities set forth in paragraph (g)(1), or (B) to prohibit an employee of an insured bank or insured institution that is an affiliate of a DIHC from promoting or advertising products or services of an affiliate of such an insured bank or institution.

Paragraph (g)(3) provides that nothing in this subsection will require the breach of a contract entered into prior to enactment of this Act. For example, a savings bank which underwrites insurance under state law would not be required to breach its contracts with any existing policyholders.

Paragraph (h): Tying And Insider Lending Provisions.

This section subjects DIHCs to the tying provisions of section 106 of the Bank Holding Company Act Amendments of 1970 and to the insider lending prohibitions of section 22(h) of the Federal Reserve Act. These sections prohibit tying between products and services offered by insured banks or insured institutions and products and services offered by the DIHC itself or by any of its other affiliates. Note, however, that these tying provisions do not apply to products and services that do not involve an insured bank or insured institution. The insider lending provisions severely limit loans by a depository institution to officers and directors of the depository institution. For purposes of both provisions, the AFRA will exercise the rulemaking authority vested in the Federal Reserve with regard to these limitations.

Subsection (i): Examination and Enforcement. This provision would state emphatically the plain intent of Congress that Federal deposit insurance funds shall not be used to benefit or protect the depository holding company or an affiliate thereof other than an insured bank or insured institution. This subsection provides that the AFRA shall use its examination and supervision authority to enforce the provisions of this section, including any rules and regulations promulgated under subsection (c). In particular, it is intended that each AFRA should structure its examination process so as to uncover possible violations of the provisions of this section and that the agency should not hestitate to make full use of its cease-and-desist powers or to impose as warranted the special penalties discussed below, if it believes that an insured bank or insured institution under its supervision that is controlled by a DIHC is in violation of any of the provisions of this section.

This subsection also grants the AFRA authority to examine any other affiliate of the DIHC as well as the DIHC itself in order to ensure compliance with the limitations of this section or other provisions of law made applicable by this section such as sections 23A and 23B of the Federal Reserve Act.

In addition, this subsection grants each AFRA the right to apply to the appropriate district court of the United States for a temporary or permanent injunction or a restraining order to enjoin any person or company from violating the provisions of this section or any regulation prescribed under this section. The AFRA may seek such an injunction or restraining order whenever it considers that an insured bank or insured institution under its supervision or any DIHC controlling such an insured bank or insured institution is violating, has violated or is about to violate any provision of this section or any regulation prescribed under this section. In seeking such an injunction or restraining order the AFRA may also request such equitable relief as may be necessary to prevent the violation in question. This relief may include a requirement that the DIHC divest itself of control of the insured bank or insured institution, if this is the only way in which the violation can be prevented.

This injunctive power will enable the AFRA to move speedily to stop practices that it believes endanger the safety and soundness of an insured bank or insured institution under its supervision that is controlled by a DIHC. If necessary to protect the depositors and safeguard the deposit insurance funds, the AFRA may request that the injunction proceedings be held in camera, so as not to provoke a run on the insured bank or insured institution.

Subsection (j): Divestiture. This subsection states that an AFRA may require a DIHC to divest itself of an insured bank or insured institution, if the agency finds that the insured bank or insured institution is engaging in a continuing course of action involving the DIHC or any of its affiliates that would endanger the safety and soundness of that insured bank or insured institution.

Although the DIHC would have the right to a hearing and to judicial review and have one year in which to divest the insured bank or insured institution, it should be emphasized that the insured bank or insured institution would operate under the close supervision of the AFRA from the date of the initial order until the date the divestiture is completed. This is intended to safeguard the insured bank or insured institution in question, its depositors and the deposit insurance funds.

Subsection (k): Criminal Penalties. This subsection provides for criminal penalties for knowing and willful violations of the provisions of this section, even if these violations do not result in an initial or final order requiring divestiture of the insured bank or insured institution. For companies found to be in violation of the provisions of this section the maximum penalty for each violation shall be the greater of (a) $250,000 per day for each day that the violation continues or (b) one one-hundredth of one percent of the minimum required capital of the insured bank or insured institution per day for each day that the violation continues, up to a maximum of 1% of the minimum capital of the insured bank or insured institution—a fine that could amount to tens of millions of dollars for a large insured bank or insured institution. Such a fine is designed to be large enough to deter even large insured banks or insured institutions from violating the provisions of this section.

For individuals found to be in violation of the provisions of this section the penalty shall be a fine and/or a prison term. The maximum fine for each violation shall be the greater of (a) $250,000 or (b) twice the individual's annual rate of total compensation at the time the violation occurred. The maximum prison sentence shall be one year. In addition, individuals violating the provisions of this section will also be subject to the penalties provided for in Section 1005 of Title 18 for false entries in any book, report or statement to the extent that the violation included such false entries.

Subsection (l): Civil Money Penalties. This subsection provides for civil money penalties for any company or person that violates the provisions of this section, and grants the AFRA the power to impose such penalties after providing the company or person accused of such violation the opportunity to object in writing to its finding.

For companies found to be in violation of this section, the maximum penalty for each violation shall be the greater of (a) $250,000 per day for each day that the violation continues, or (b) one one-hundredth of one percent of the minimum required capital of the insured bank or insured institution per day for each day that the violation continues, up to a maximum of 1% of the minimum capital of the insured bank or insured institution. For individuals found to be in violation of the provisions of this section, the maximum penalty shall be the greater of (a) $250,000 or (b) twice the individual's annual rate of total compensation at the time the violation occurred. The actual amount of the penalty imposed on companies and individuals shall depend on the gravity of the violation, the size of the company's or person's resources and other relevant factors.

Subsection (m): Judicial Review. This subsection provides for judicial review of decisions reached by an AFRA under the provisions of this section. This right to review includes a right of judicial review of statutes, rules, regulations, orders and other actions that would discriminate against DIHCs or affiliates controlled by such companies.

Section 102: Amendment to the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956

This section contains a conforming amendment to the definition of the term "bank" in the Bank Holding Company Act to ensure that a DIHC owning an insured bank will be regulated under this Act rather than the Bank Holding Company Act.

Section 103: Amendments to the Federal Reserve Act.

This section clarifies the application of Section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act to certain loans and extensions of credit to persons who are not affiliated with a member bank. Section 23A contains a provision that was intended to prevent the use of "straw man" intermediaries to evade section 23A's limitations on loans and extensions of credit to affiliates. Contrary to its original purpose, the provision may also be literally read to restrict a bona fide loan or extension of credit to a third party who happens to use the proceeds to purchase goods or services from an affiliate of the bank; such a loan could occur, for example, if a customer happened to use a credit card issued by a bank to buy an item sold by the bank's affiliate. This section clarifies that such loans and extensions of credit are not covered by section 23A as long as (i) the bank approves them in accordance with substantially the same standards and procedures and on substantially the same terms that it applies to similar loans or extensions of credit that do not involve the payment of the proceeds to an affiliate, and (ii) the loans or extensions of credit are not made for the purpose of evading any requirement of section 23A.

Section 104: Amendments to the Banking Act of 1933.

Subsection (a) amends section 20 of the Glass-Steagall Act so that it does not apply to member banks that are controlled by DIHCs.

Subsection (b) amends section 32 of the Glass-Steagall Act so that it does not apply to officers, directors and employees of affiliates of a single depository institution holding company.

Section 105: Amendment to the Federal Deposit Insurance Act.

This section amends the Change in Bank Control Act to provide that an acquisition of a DIHC controlling an insured bank may only be accomplished after complying with that Act's procedures. It also modifies the definition of "control" in the Change in Bank Control Act to conform it to the definition in section 101(a)(10) of this Act.

Section 106: Amendments to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

This section amends the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 to provide for the registration and regulation of broker dealers.

Section 107: Amendment to the National Housing Act.

This section amends the Change in Savings and Loan Control Act to provide that an acquisition of a DIHC controlling an insured institution may only be accomplished after complying with that Act's procedures. It also modifies the definition of "control" in the Change in Savings and Loan Control Act to conform it to the definition in section 101(a)(10) of this Act.

Section 108: Amendment to the Community Reinvestment Act.

This section amends the Community Reinvestment Act to make it applicable to acquisitions of insured banks and insured institutions by DIHCs.

TITLE II—SUPERVISORY IMPROVEMENTS

Section 201: National Financial Services Committee.

This section establishes a standing committee, the National Financial Services Committee (Committee), in order to provide a forum in which federal and state regulators can reach a consensus regarding how the regulation of depository institutions should evolve in response to changing market conditions. In addition, the Committee also provides a mechanism through which various federal regulatory agencies could coordinate their responses to a financial crisis, if such a crisis were to occur. The Committee comprises all federal agencies responsible for regulating financial institutions or financial activities, and it is structured to allow state regulators to participate in its deliberations. The Committee would be empowered to make recommendations to Congress to strengthen the protections surrounding the insured institutions as well as the restrictions on interaffiliate transactions in order to protect the integrity of the deposit insurance funds.

The Committee is directed to report to Congress within one year of enactment of this Act on proposed legislative or regulatory actions that will improve the examination process to permit better oversight of all banks and thrifts. In this regard, it must consider whether the number of or compensation for examiners should be increased. It is also directed to establish uniform principles and standards for examinations.

TITLE III—THRIFT IMPROVEMENTS

Section 301: Amendments to the National Housing Act.

In order to bring much needed capital into the thrift industry and thereby improve the situation of the FSLIC, this section increases the value of the thrift franchise by removing certain onerous restrictions on insured institutions and their parent savings and loan holding companies. In addition, this section takes measures to make the status of unitary thrift holding companies comparable to that of DIHCs.

Subsection (a) exempts an insured institution controlled by a DIHC from the definition of insured institution for purposes of the Savings and Loan Holding Company Act. A DIHC that controls one or more insured institutions will therefore not be deemed to be a savings and loan holding company.

Subsection (b) subjects savings and loan holding companies' insured institution subsidiaries which meet the qualified thrift lender test (i.e., primarily engaged in real estate lending and other related activities) to the restrictions upon affiliate transactions applicable to all insured institutions as set forth in subsection (f) below.

Subsection (c) substantially conforms the criteria for control of an insured institution to the standards set forth in Section 101 of this Act regarding the control of an insured institution by a DIHC.

Subsection (d) provides that savings and loan holding companies and their subsidiaries will not be subject to debt approval requirements, if each of their insured institution subsidiaries has met the qualified thrift lender requirements throughout two of the three preceding fiscal quarters.

Subsection (e) deletes the Savings and Loan Holding Company Act management interlock prohibitions, thereby eliminating the redundancy of applying two sets of management interlocks regulations to savings and loan holding companies. Savings and loan holding company management officials will therefore be subject only to the provisions of the Depository Institution Management Interlocks Act.

Subsection (f) sets forth a new set of affiliate transaction standards applicable to insured institutions. All insured institutions are specifically subject to the affiliate transaction provisions of section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act. The FSLIC will administer section 23A as it applies to insured institutions and will have the same power as the Federal Reserve Board to implement rules and regulations regarding section 23A as the Federal Reserve Board does in applying section 23A to member banks. For example, the FSLIC could determine by regulation that subsidiaries of insured institutions are affiliates of such institutions for the purposes of section 23A. The FSLIC may waive (except in the case of an insured institution controlled by a DIHC) the provisions of section 23A if it determines that such a waiver would not be detrimental to the interests of the institution's savings account holders or to the insurance risk of the FSLIC. In addition, subsection (f) imposes certain provisions of section 22 (g) and (h) of the Federal Reserve Act, relating to extensions of credit to executive officers and directors of banks, to insured institutions and their holding companies.

Subsection (g) provides that the laws, rules and regulation preempted with respect to DIHCs and their affiliates by Section 101(f) are also preempted with respect to savings and loan holding companies.

Subsection (h) exempts savings and loan holding companies, each of whose insured institution subsidiaries meet the qualified thrift lender requirement, from restrictions contained in Section 408(r) of the National Housing Act on affiliation with institutions engaged in the underwriting and distribution of securities.

Subsection (i) exempts savings and loan holding companies, each of whose insured institution subsidiaries meet the qualified thrift lender requirement, from restrictions on cross marketing contained in Section 408(p) of the National Housing Act.

Section 302: Amendments to the Depository Institutions Management Interlocks Act

This section amends the Depository Institutions Management Interlocks Act to permit management interlocks between savings and loan holding companies whose insured institution subsidiaries satisfy the qualified thrift lender requirement and nonaffiliated depository institutions or holding companies, unless the Federal Home Loan Bank Board determines that such an interlock would result in a monopoly or tend to lessen competition, and the Board further determines that prohibiting the interlock is the only way to prevent these anti-competitive effects.

Section 302: Effective Date

The Act will become effective upon enactment.●

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I would like to add my name as cosponsor to the legislation that Senators CRANSTON and D'AMATO are introducing today, the Depository Institutions Affiliation Act. Let me provide a few brief remarks as to why I am doing so.

A few weeks ago, I cosponsored legislation, S. 305, with Senator DIXON and others that would repeal key elements of the Glass-Steagall Act—legislation that is virtually identical to the Proxmire Financial Modernization Act of 1988 that passed the Senate by an overwhelming margin last year, only to die in the House of Representatives. I think that legislation represented a solid, workable compromise that a consensus of Members obviously could support in this difficult area of financial services competition. If enacted, it clearly would have been a great step forward toward making our financial services industry more competitive both domestically and internationally.

S. 305 also adopted the holding company structure as the vehicle for allowing affiliations among differing types of financial institutions. I continue to support that structure as a way to enhance competition, to isolate institutions benefiting from deposit insurance from inappropriate risks, and to protect against unfair competition.

But as I said recently when S. 305 was introduced, I do not support every aspect of the legislation. There were concepts that I agreed last year to drop or compromise as the final legislative product was hammered out. Some of those concepts may need to be revisited, especially in light of the changes that have occurred in the financial services marketplace just since last year's compromises were agreed upon.

Today I am cosponsoring the Depository Institutions Affiliations Act because I believe it raises issues that must now be addressed if we are to proceed responsibly in the area of financial structure reform.

As an example, the legislation fashioned by Senators CRANSTON and D'AMATO raises the issue of how best to provide the vast amounts of capital that will be needed by our financial services industry. The Cranston/D'Amato bill would open the option of allowing that capital to be raised through investments by corporations that are not today allowed to invest in certain segments of our financial services industry.

The Cranston/D'Amato bill also directly raises the issue of how best to assure the competitive viability of America's financial services providers in the face of intensified international competition that will result from developments like the competitive structure being put in place for in Europe 1992.

In brief, Mr. President, while I do not endorse all of the elements of the Depository Institution Affiliation Act, I am cosponsoring this bill because I believe that it raises important issues that Congress must soon address if we are to assure the health and competitiveness of America's financial services providers both at home and in the increasingly important international financial services marketplace.●

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Intelligence be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, March 7, 1989, at 10:30 a.m. to hold a closed business meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

IN SUPPORT OF U.N. HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION INVESTIGATION OF ROMANIA

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to bring to my colleagues' attention that on March 3 at the U.N. Commission on Human Rights' annual meeting in Geneva, the Swedish Government introduced a resolution which called for the appointment of a special rapporteur to investigate Romanian human rights practices.

I commend Sweden for introducing this resolution, and Austria, Australia, France, England, Hungary, and Portugal for cosponsoring it. It is my understanding that the United States has been lobbying for the Swedish resolution and informally supporting it since it was circulated in draft form in the beginning of February. The United States did not cosponsor this resolution because Sweden did not want our cosponsorship. We believed that our support was more helpful when given informally.

It is especially noteworthy that not only did Hungary, Romania's ally in the Warsaw Pact, cosponsor this resolution, but prior to its introduction, the Hungarian State Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Gyula Horn, actually called Romania to account for its serious human rights violations against the 2½ million ethnic Hungarians in Romania, and demanded a U.N. investigation of human rights abuses in that country. It is the first time one Warsaw Pact country has either denounced another in front of the Human Rights Commission or demanded a formal inquiry.

Horn specifically denounced the repression of the Hungarian ethnic minority in Romania and the wholesale destruction of villages to facilitate a forced industrialization program ordered by Romanian leader Ceausescu. He also criticized the denial of religious freedom and the forced assimilation of minorities. These policies, he asserted, have caused some 15,000 Romanians to seek asylum in Hungary.

Mr. President, this issue is nothing new for those of us who have followed Romania's sorry human rights record, and in particular, its abuse of the ethic Hungarian minority. Indeed, the Senate has already expressed its condemnation of Romania human rights practices through its support for revocation of Romania's most-favored-nation status, and its passage of a resolution condemning President Ceausescu's plans to destroy ethnic Hungarian villages.

Last year, I introduced Senate Resolution 461, which put the Senate on record in opposition to President Ceausescu's plans to destroy more than half of Romania's traditonal folk villages, greatly damaging the Hungarian and German minorities who largely populate them. President Ceausescu's actions violate the human rights, minority cultural rights, and property rights of the affected Romanians, and also dilute the cultural identity of the two major ethnic minorities in Romania—Hungarians and Germans.

The resolution, which passed the Senate unanimously, took note of Romania's continuing abysmal record on human rights in general, and urged the President and the Secretary of State to continue to press the Romanian Government for meaningful reforms.

Unfortunately, President Ceausescu's razing of Romania's villages is not surprising in Ceausescu's Romania, which already suppresses the study and teaching of the Hungarian language, limits Hungarian language publications, and has institutionalized widespread discrimination against ethnic Hungarians, all in violation of its obligations under the Helsinki accords and other international human rights agreements.

His razing of these villages is only one part of an overall pattern in which the Romanian Government continues to violate the human rights of its citizens. It has a sad history of denying ethnic minorities, among them 2.5 million Hungarians, Germans, Serbs, Croatians, Saxons, and Ukrainians, the right to preserve their unique cultural heritage and native language, and the right of their children to be educated in their native tongue.

The Romanian Government also continues to interfere with freedom of religion, harassing intimidating, and arresting religious believers for as little as possession of Bibles, and destroying places of worship. Romania's human rights policies have not shown improvement despite congressional votes 2 years ago to strip Romania of its most-favored-nation trading status.

The consequences of Ceausescu's actions have been increased emigration from Romania and a deterioration of relations between its closest neighbor and Warsaw Pact ally, Hungary. Because of President Ceausescu's actions in this matter, and because of his other abuses of the Hungarian minority, more than 30,000 Romanian citizens, roughly 10 percent of whom are reportedly ethnic Romanians, have fled that country and sought refuge in neighboring Hungary since last summer. This is an exodus of unprecedented magnitude.

It is high time that Romania's miserable human rights record be subjected to the international scrutiny that results from an investigation by the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, and I am proud that the United States is supporting that action.

I ask that a copy of the statement by Ambassador Jan Romare, head of the Swedish delegation to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, a copy of the Swedish resolution, be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY THE HEAD OF THE SWEDISH DELEGATION, AMBASSADOR JAN ROMARE, ON MARCH 3, 1989

Mr. Chairman, in his statement to the Commission last week, the Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs made clear the importance the Swedish Government attaches to the machinery of rapporteurs, representatives or working groups to observe developments either in specific countries or with regard to specific violations of human rights, wherever they occur. He also underlined that the credibility of this Commission requires that attention and scrutiny be directed at all situations of serious human rights violations and that in doing so, the Commission is not primarily concerned with condemning a government for its performance. Our purpose must be to help the victims of human rights violations.

Mr. Chairman, human rights and fundamental freedoms are violated in all parts of the world, also on my own continent, Europe.

Europe today is a continent in the process of great and significant change, developments which, not least, involve a renewed consciousness, and strengthening of the respect of human rights. It is a cause for great satisfaction and expectation.

However, Romania is a country which remains aloof to these developments.

Many speakers have commented on the human rights situation in Romania before the Commission at this session.

In general terms that situation can be described as one of massive repression, where everyone, except for a few at the top, is denied his or her most fundamental freedoms such as those of opinion, expression and conscience, by a huge apparatus that probes into the privacy of individuals.

In Romania you need official permission to have a typewriter because a typewriter can make copies of words that may displease the Government.

In Romania you need special permission to travel abroad. Your application for such permission may be turned down and you will be marked down as politically unreliable for having applied. Harassments usually follow.

Romania is not a rich country. It is poor, although with the resources of rich agriculture. It is not so poor, however, that it should have to keep its population near starvation. But that is the effect of an economic policy which no one in the country may question.

The Romanian Government has presented a programme for village systematization which would include the destruction of thousands of villages, hence also the destruction of cultural values and long-standing traditions, and the enforced relocation of their inhabitants. The Government has stayed its hand, partly, it seems, under the pressure of international opinion. International opinion, therefore, must continue to make itself felt for we believe that the programme has by no means been abandoned.

The rights of individuals belonging to national minorities in Romania are increasingly being curtailed.

Mr. Chairman, in Romania there is no civil unrest to explain why the authorities see fit to employ their repressive apparatus. The widespread misery has not caused major demonstrations, not because people are contented but simply because demonstrations of this kind are not allowed. Such expressions of discontent as have occurred were silenced by strong violence.

The human rights violations in Romania are the wilful act of its Government. Other governments have tried to reason with the Romanian Government, but that government will not listen.

For these various reasons, Mr. Chairman, my delegation has the honour to introduce a draft resolution on the human rights situation in Romania, contained in document no L.76. This draft resolution is introduced on behalf of the delegations of Australia, Austria, France, Hungary, Portugal, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as well as the delegation of Sweden.

The draft resolution refers to some general points I have made. It refers also to the fact that Romania is a party to the two International Convenants on human rights. Finally, the Commission would, according to this draft resolution, decide "to request its Chairman, after consultation with the Bureau, to appoint a Special Rapporteur of the Commission with the mandate to examine the human rights situation in Romania."

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

AGENDA ITEM 12

HUMAN RIGHTS SITUATION IN ROMANIA

THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Guided by the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,

Reaffirming that the Governments of all Member States have an obligation to promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms and to fulfill the obligations they have undertaken under the relevant international instruments,

Concerned at the allegations of serious violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Romania,

Noting that Romania is a party to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,

Reaffirming the essential task of the United Nations to ensure the observance, promotion and strengthening of human rights among Member States,

1. Expresses its concern at the allegations of serious violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Romania,

2. Notes that the Romanian Government's policy of rural systematization, which involves forcible resettlement and affects long-standing traditions, would, if implemented, lead to a further violation of the human rights of large sectors of the population,

3. Notes further that widespread expressions of international concern have contributed to a change of presentation of this policy;

4. Expresses its concern at the imposition of increasingly severe obstacles for Romania's national minorities to maintain their cultural identity;

5. Notes with concern that nationals of Romania have sought and continue to seek protection and refuge in neighboring countries for reasons related to the serious violations of their human righs;

6. Urges, the Romanian Government to abide by its international obligations under the Covenants;

7. Decides to request its Chairman, after consultation with the Bureau, to appoint a Special Rapporteur of the Commission with the mandate to examine the human rights situation in Romania;

8. Authorizes the Special Rapporteur to seek relevant information from the Government of Romania, specialized agencies, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations:

9. Requests the Special Rapporteur to report to the forty-sixth session of the Commission;

10. Urges the Government of Romania to extend its co-operation to the Commission and its Special Rapporteur;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Special Rapporteur to enable him to carry out his mandate in the best possible conditions;

12. Decides to continue its consideration of the human rights situation in Romania at its forty-sixth session under the agenda item "Question of the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in any part of the world".●

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION TO EMPEROR'S FUNERAL

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, during the week of February 20, I was absent from the Senate because of my participation as a member of the congressional delegation to the funeral of Emperor Hirohito of Japan. I considered it a great honor to be asked by the distinguished majority and minority leaders to represent the Congress at this important event, along with my colleagues Senator CRANSTON, House Majority Leader TOM FOLEY, and Congresswoman PATRICIA SAIKI.

It was extremely significant that President Bush, so early in his administration, decided that he would personally lead the official U.S. delegation to the funeral. His decision served to underscore the significant role United States relations with Japan will have in the Bush administration. I might add that the citizens of my home State of Alaska were happy to welcome the President and the First Lady during their brief stopover while enroute to Japan.

The United States congressional delegation's participation in the funeral ceremonies was also warmly received by the Japanese people as a signal that the Congress too, places a high priority on strengthening our ties with Japan.

As a Member of this body who has had a longstanding interest and association with Japan, it was a great honor for me to represent the Senate at this juncture in Japan's history.●

ANTI-APARTHEID ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1989

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, last Friday, March 3, I introduced S. 507, the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989. Due to an oversight, the text of S. 507 did not appear in the March 3 RECORD. I ask that the full text of S. 507 with accompanying statements by me, Senator CRANSTON, and Senator KENNEDY be inserted in the RECORD.

The material follows:

ANTI-APARTHEID ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1989

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today I am introducing with my colleagues Senator KENNEDY, Senator CRANSTON, and Senator GORE the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989 calling for comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. This is identical to the bill introduced by Representative RON DELLUMS, H.R. 21. We believe that this measure—which includes a trade embargo and strong disinvestment provisions—continues to represent the most meaningful way of exerting pressure on the South African Government for peaceful change and the emergence of justice in that country.

Just 1 year ago South Africa banned 17 key antiapartheid organizations and significantly restricted the activities of the largest trade union federation, the Congress of South African Trade Unions. During the past year alone more than 30 organizations have been banned.

We have also seen, in the Delmas Trial convictions, a judiciary in South Africa that is willing to convict antiapartheid leaders for their peaceful protest against apartheid. That is something we do not understand here in the United States. And when angry, victimized people cannot even express their views freely, violence becomes more and more inevitable. Even the religious community, which is now the single most important public antiapartheid voice, faces intimidation and threats.

Nelson Mandela and nearly all other political prisoners have yet to be released. The Government continues its efforts to gag and silence the press. And the state of emergency continues. The recent Tripartite Agreement among South Africa, Angola, and Cuba, which will bring independence to Namibia, was a significant step toward peace in that region. I applaud the South African Government for their participation in the agreement. I welcome meaningful efforts for peace in that troubled region and commend all the parties to the agreement for this achievement and for finally opening the way for Namibian independence. But that in no way substitutes for the need to address the central question of how apartheid in South Africa is going to end. We want that change to be peaceful. And both internal and external pressures are critical to bringing the South African Government and the real black leaders together for serious talks on ending apartheid.

I hope that we can develop a greater consensus here in the Senate for an effective and vigorous policy on South Africa and that we can encourage more productive cooperation between Congress and the new administration.

It is essential that this cooperative approach include efforts on the part of the administration to follow through on multilateral measures that may be taken to undermine apartheid. The Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 anticipated this important component to our own efforts. At the United Nations, we need to introduce our own sanctions and promote them, not vote against them. We need to provide active leadership in the international community for concerted action against apartheid. As chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on African Affairs, I plan to introduce, in the near future, a resolution to urge the administration to move on the multilateral front, to press South Africa's other major trading partners—Japan, West Germany, the United Kingdom, France, and Italy—to join in our own sanctions and to agree on other measures designed to bring about peaceful change in South Africa.

The community of nations is watching with great interest what steps a new United States administration and a new Congress will take on the question of apartheid in South Africa. We await change in South Africa, and look for hopeful signs, but there are few. But this is clear: The world is today more ready to follow our lead in pressing for peaceful change in South Africa.●

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join with my colleagues Senators SIMON and KENNEDY in introducing legislation designed to combat the evils of apartheid in South Africa.

This legislation is necessary because the 1986 comprehensive sanctions bill did not go far enough in pressing for an end to the abhorrent system of apartheid. The South African regime has managed to circumvent several provisions of that law by exploiting loopholes; other provisions have suffered because of weak enforcement by the administration. Additionally, other nations have profited by U.S. sanctions because the President did not pursue a multilateral strategy for opposing apartheid, as Congress recommended.

In the meantime, repression in South Africa has grown worse, although a near total press blackout has concealed much of the ravages of increasing oppression:

Virtually all avenues for peaceful dissent have been foreclosed.

Thousands of apartheid opponents have been detained.

Many hundreds of these have been children. Many have been tortured.

Virtually all organizations, including church and labor groups, who have questioned apartheid, have been banned.

Opponents of the regime are bombed at home and murdered abroad.

We must therefore act. Indeed, we are now obligated by law to take the necessary next step to curb sharply our economic relations with the South African regime. The Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 called for additional measures if substantial progress was not made within a year. And the situation is far from improved—it has in fact grown considerably worse. This legislation will take that required next step. These measures will close the loopholes, broaden the scope of the sanctions, and require negotiations with other industrialized democracies to ensure a strong, multilateral approach to opposing apartheid.

The choice of whether or not to do business with the racist regime in South Africa is a moral one. We must choose the path that demonstrates America has an unshakable commitment to the forces of democracy.

There are important strategic concerns involved as well. We must develop a strong relationship with black leaders who will one day have a strong voice in governing South Africa. And we must try to convince the white minority that we will resume normal relations once progress is achieved, and that we seek to protect their political rights under majority rule. Our commitment must be to human rights, freedom, and democracy for all South Africans, black and white.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators SIMON, CRANSTON, and GORE in reintroducing a bill that will once again place the United States in the forefront of efforts to end apartheid in South Africa; the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989.

Nearly 2 years have passed since Congress overrode President Reagan's veto and made the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 the law of this land. That bill became America's first truly effective step in ending racism in South Africa. Today, with the introduction of this legislation, Congress begins the next step in that worldwide struggle.

When it passed the 1986 sanctions bill, Congress made clear its intention to move forward with additional sanctions if the Government of South Africa failed to make substantial progress toward ending apartheid. Over the last 2 years, the Botha government has abandoned all pretense of reform; it has renewed the state of emergency, it has banned opposition organizations and individuals. It continues its ruthless aggression against its neighbors and shows blatant disregard for human rights and the rule of law. Clearly, the time has now come for additional sanctions.

As the groundbreaking study, uprooting poverty, has demonstrated, black South Africans live in worse conditions than their brothers and sisters in the rest of black Africa. For instance, infant mortality of blacks in South Africa is higher than that in many other African nations, including Botswana, Zimbabwe, Kenya, the Congo, and Zambia. In measuring economic inequality, South Africa has the worst disparity of any of the 57 countries in the world for which data are available. When it comes to economic injustice, South Africa has the most shameful record in the world. Apartheid's pass laws, artificial homelands, the group areas act, and the forced removals make apartheid a daily living nightmare for black men, women, and children in South Africa.

There are those who say that comprehensive sanctions have not worked and will not work, and that they will only harden the resistance to change inside South Africa. But in 40 years of silence, throughout the years of cooperation, maintenance of the status quo, and years of constructive engagement, apartheid has not ended. Our modest sanctions over the last 2½ years have not worked, because they do not go far enough and because there has been no international cooperation in the effort to end apartheid. In fact, the United States has repeatedly vetoed the efforts in the United Nations to isolate the regime in Pretoria.

Apartheid will only be ended with a clear, consistent, and concerted policy of all nations working together to apply the full range of political, diplomatic, and economic pressure against the South African regime.

The American people have always cherished freedom and human dignity. We share a responsibility to protect civil rights and promote the rule of law. Let us hope that, as one of his first steps in foreign policy, President Bush will reverse the drift of complacency regarding South Africa of the past 8 years. I urge the administration to put the United States Government at the forefront of the struggle against apartheid by lending its full support to this legislation.

We are now in a new Congress, in a new administration, and it is time to take new steps against apartheid. I urge my colleagues to put the United States on the right side of history and justice in South Africa by supporting this important legislation.

TITLE I—SANCTIONS AGAINST INVESTMENT IN, AND EXPORTS TO, SOUTH AFRICA AND OTHER MEASURES (EXCEPT IMPORT RESTRICTIONS) TO END APARTHEID
PART A—AMENDMENTS TO THE COMPREHENSIVE ANTI-APARTHEID ACT OF 1986 AND OTHER LAWS
SEC. 101. PROHIBITIONS ON INVESTMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA.
(a) PROHIBITIONS ON INVESTMENT.—Effective 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, section 301 of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (hereafter in this Act referred to as "the Act") is amended to read as follows:
"PROHIBITION ON INVESTMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA
"SEC. 301. (a) Subject to subsections (b) and (c), a United States person may not purchase, acquire, own, or hold any investment in South Africa.
"(b) The prohibition under subsection (a) shall not apply to any investment in a business enterprise owned and controlled by South Africans economically and politically disadvantaged by apartheid where such business enterprise is and continues to be not less than 90 percent owned by, and under the control of, South Africans economically and politically disadvantaged by apartheid.
"(c)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a), any individual described in paragraph (2), may continue to own and hold investments in South Africa during any period and to the extent that such investments are considered South African emigrant non-resident assets and subject to restrictions on their transfer or disposition under the exchange control regulations of the Government of South Africa (promulgated pursuant to the Currency and Exchange Act of 1933 and as in effect on June 2, 1988) which limit the ability of such an individual to comply with the prohibitions under subsection (a).
"(2) An individual, for purposes of paragraph (1), is an individual who, on the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989, is—
"(A) a former citizen or resident of South Africa; and
"(B)(i) a citizen of the United States; or
"(ii) an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States.".
(b) WAIVER.—A person affected by the prohibition under section 301 of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (as amended by subsection (a)) may apply to the President for a one-time waiver of the prohibition. With respect to any applicant, the President may waive the application of section 301 for not more than 180 days after such section takes effect. Such waiver may be granted only for good cause. During any period of waiver under this subsection, the provisions of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 as in effect before the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989 shall apply and the President may not waive any such provision.
(c) NEGOTIATIONS WITH EMPLOYEE ORGANIZATIONS REGARDING TERMINATION OF INVESTMENT.—(1) A controlled South African entity, subject to the investment prohibition under section 301 of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (as amended by subsection (a)), that employs more than 24 South Africans economically and politically disadvantaged by apartheid—
(A) shall notify all such South African employees and their employee organizations of a termination of investment not less than 90 days prior to such termination; and
(B) shall enter into good faith negotiations with trade unions representing such disadvantaged South Africans (or with other representative worker organizations if there are no such unions) regarding the terms of a termination.
(2) Negotiations under paragraph (1)(B) shall include discussions and agreements concerning pension benefits; relocation of employees; continuation of existing union recognition agreements; severance pay; and acquisition of the terminated business or the business assets by entities representing South Africans economically and politically disadvantaged by apartheid including trade unions, union-sponsored workers' trusts, other representative worker organizations, and employees.
SEC. 102. PROHIBITION ON EXPORTS TO SOUTH AFRICA.
Effective 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, section 303 of the Act is amended to read as follows:
"PROHIBITION OF EXPORTS TO SOUTH AFRICA FROM THE UNITED STATES
"SEC. 303. (a) No goods or technology subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may be exported, or re-exported, to South Africa. No goods or technology may be exported, or re-exported, to South Africa by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.
"(b) The prohibitions under subsection (a) shall not apply to—
"(1) publications, including books, newspapers, magazines, films, television programming, phonograph records, video and audio tape recordings, photographs, microfilm, microfiche, posters, and similar materials;
"(2) donations of articles intended to relieve human suffering, such as food, clothing, and medicine and medical supplies intended strictly for medical purposes;
"(3) commercial sales of agricultural commodities and products; and
"(4) goods and technology for use in the gathering or dissemination of information by news media organizations subject to the jurisdiction of the United States which provide an assurance to the Secretary of State that such goods and technology will not be used, leased, sold, or transferred to any South African entity.
"(c) The prohibitions under subsection (a) shall not apply to any goods that are the direct product of technology of United States origin under a written agreement entered into on or before April 20, 1988, and that are exported prior to the date which is one year after the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989.
"(d) The prohibitions under subsection (a) shall not apply to—
"(1) economic assistance or human rights programs for disadvantaged South Africans, South African blacks or other nonwhite South Africans, or victims of apartheid in South Africa pursuant to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, or any other provision of law authorizing economic or human rights assistance programs; and
"(2) contributions to charitable organizations engaged in social welfare, public health, religious, educational, and emergency relief activities in South Africa.".
SEC. 103. REPEAL OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE ACT; DEFINITIONS.
"(a) REPEAL OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE ACT.—Effective 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 is amended—
(1) in title I by striking section 110;
(2) in title II—
(A) by striking sections 207 and 212; and
(B) by redesignating section 211 as section 207;
(3) in title III—
(A) by striking sections 304, 309, 310, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, and 323;
(B) by redesignating section 315 as section 309; and
(C) by redesignating section 316 as section 310.
(b) DEFINITIONS.—
(1) Paragraphs (3) and (4) of section 3 of the Act are amended to read as follows:
"(3) the term 'investment in South Africa' means—
"(A) a commitment of funds or other assets (in order to earn a financial return) to a South African entity, including—
"(i) a loan or other extension of credit made to a South African entity, or security given for the debts of an entity;
"(ii) the beneficial ownership or control of a share or interest in a South African entity, or of a bond or other debt instrument issued by such an entity; or
"(iii) capital contributions in money or other assets to a South African entity; or
"(B) the control of a South African entity in cases in which subparagraph (A) does not apply;
"(4) the term 'loan'—
"(A) means any transfer or extension of funds or credit on the basis of an obligation to repay, or any assumption or guarantee of the obligation of another to repay an extension of funds or credit, including—
"(i) overdrafts;
"(ii) currency swaps;
"(iii) the purchase of debt or equity securities issued by the Government of South Africa or a South African entity on or after the date of enactment of this Act;
"(iv) the purchase of a loan made by another person;
"(v) the sale of financial assets subject to an agreement to repurchase;
"(vi) a renewal or refinancing whereby funds or credits are transferred or extended to the Government of South Africa or a South African entity;
"(vii) short-term trade financing, as by letters of credit or similar trade credits;
"(viii) sales on open account in cases where such sales are normal business practice; and
"(ix) rescheduling of existing loans; and
"(B) does not include, a loan for which an agreement was entered into before April 20, 1988, so long as such a loan is maintained under the terms in effect on such date;".
(2) Section 3 of the Act is further amended by—
(A) striking "and" after the semicolon in paragraph (8)(B);
(B) striking the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting a semicolon; and
(C) adding at the end of such section the following:
"(10) the terms 'United States person' and 'person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States' mean—
"(A) any person, wherever located, who is a citizen or resident of the United States;
"(B) any person actually within the United States;

"(C) any entity organized under the laws of the United States or of any State, territory, possession, or district of the United States; and

"(D) any partnership, association, corporation, or other organization, wherever organized or doing business, that is owned or controlled by persons specified in subparagraphs (A), (B), or (C) of this paragraph;

"(11) the terms 'goods' and 'technology' have the meanings given such terms by section 16 of the Export Administration Act of 1979;

"(12) the term 'goods subject to the jurisdiction of the United States' includes goods that are the direct product of technology of United States origin; and

"(13) the term 'foreign person'—

"(A) means any person who is not a United States person or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and

"(B) does not include any government or any agency or other entity or instrumentality thereof (including a government-sponsored agency) unless any such agency, entity, or instrumentality is a business enterprise.".

"(3) The amendments made by this subsection shall take effect 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 104. PROHIBITION ON UNITED STATES INTELLIGENCE AND MILITARY COOPERATION WITH SOUTH AFRICA.

(a) AMENDMENT TO COMPREHENSIVE ANTI-APARTHEID ACT OF 1986.—The Act is amended by striking section 322 and adding after section 303 the following new section:

"PROHIBITION ON UNITED STATES INTELLIGENCE AND MILITARY COOPERATION WITH SOUTH AFRICA

"SEC. 304. (a)(1) No agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities may engage in any form of cooperation, direct or indirect, with the Government of South Africa (specifically including the authorities administering Namibia so long as Namibia is illegally occupied).

"(2) The prohibition under paragraph (1) may not be construed to affect the collection of intelligence under any circumstances which do not involve any form of cooperation, direct or indirect, with the Government of South Africa.

"(b) No agency or entity of the United States may engage in any form of cooperation, direct or indirect, with the armed forces of the Government of South Africa.

"(c) The prohibitions of this section shall not apply to the conduct of diplomatic activities or to intelligence information concerning the military activities or equipment in southern Africa of Cuban military forces or of another Communist country acting in concert with Cuban military forces.

"(d) Funds authorized to be appropriated or otherwise made available by the Congress (including funds specified in a classified schedule of authorizations or appropriations) may not be obligated or expended by any agency or entity of the United States for any expenses related to any cooperation prohibited by this section.

"(e) Consistent with the objections of this section it is the sense of the Congress that the President should not—

"(1) assign or detail any member of the United States Armed Forces to serve as, or otherwise perform the functions of, a defense (or military) attache in South Africa; or

"(2) accredit any individual to serve as, or otherwise perform the functions of, a defense (or military) attache at a South African diplomatic mission in the United States.".

"(b) AMENDMENT TO INTELLIGENCE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 1987.—Section 107 of the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1987 (Public Law 99-569) is hereby repealed.

SEC. 105. PROHIBITION ON NUCLEAR ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA.

Section 307 of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"PROHIBITION ON NUCLEAR ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA

"Sec. 307. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Energy shall not, under section 57b. (2) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, authorize any person to engage, directly or indirectly, in the production of special nuclear material in South Africa.".

SEC. 106. INDEPENDENCE OF NAMIBIA.

(a) ADDITIONAL MEASURE FOR TERMINATION OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE ACT.—Section 311 of the Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "402(a)," before "501(c)" in the matter preceding paragraph (1),

(B) in paragraph (4) by striking "and" after the semicolon,

(C) in paragraph (5) by striking the period and inserting "; and", and

(D) by adding after paragraph (5) the following new paragraph:

"(6) ends the illegal occupation of Namibia and implements United Nations Resolution 435 which calls for the independence of Namibia."; and

(2) in subsection (b)—

(A) by inserting "402(a)," before "501(c)", and

(B) by amending paragraph (2) to read as follows:

"(2) taken four of the five actions listed in paragraphs (2) through (6) of subsection (a), and".

(b) POLICY TOWARD THE GOVERNMENT OF SOUTH AFRICA.—Section 101(b) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (5) by striking "and" after the semicolon;

(2) by striking the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting "; and"; and

(3) by adding after paragraph (6) the following new paragraph (7):

"(7) end South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia and implement United Nations Resolution 435 which calls for the establishment of an independent Namibia.".

SEC. 107. PENALTIES.

(a) GENERAL PROVISION.—Section 603(b) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Except as otherwise provided in this section—

"(1) any person that violates the provisions of this Act, or any regulation, license, or order issued to carry out this Act shall be subject to a civil penalty of $50,000;

"(2)(A) any person, other than an individual, that willfully violates the provisions of this Act, or any regulation, license, or order issued to carry out this Act shall be fined not more than $1,000,000;

SEC. 110. ASSISTANCE FOR DISADVANTAGED SOUTH AFRICANS.

(a) AMENDMENT TO FOREIGN ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1961.—Section 535(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

"SEC. 535. ECONOMIC SUPPORT FOR DISADVANTAGED SOUTH AFRICANS.—(a)(1) Up to $40,000,000 of the funds authorized to be appropriated to carry out this chapter and any other economic development assistance activities under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, for the fiscal year 1990 and each fiscal year thereafter, shall be available for assistance for disadvantaged South Africans. Assistance under this section shall be provided for activities that are consistent with the objective of a majority of South Africans for an end to the apartheid system and the establishment of a society based on nonracial principles. Such activities may include scholarships (including scholarships for study in the health care professions and the health sciences), assistance to promote the participation of disadvantaged South Africans in trade unions and private enterprise, alternative education and community development programs, and training and other assistance (including legal aid in challenging government media restrictions) for South African journalists.".

(2) in paragraph (2) by striking "programs for South Africa's trade unionists." and inserting "and other support programs (including legal assistance) for trade unions in South Africa and Namibia, including COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions), NACTU (National Council of Trade Unions), and NUNW (National Union of Namibian Workers), their affiliates, and other viable unions in order to develop a balanced assistance program which is representative of the trade union movement."; and

(3) by adding after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) Not less than $4,000,000 of the amounts provided for each fiscal year pursuant to this subsection shall be available for programs of refugee education and assistance for South Africans and Namibians.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall take effect October 1, 1989.

SEC. 111. RESTRICTIONS REGARDING INVOLVEMENT IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ENERGY SECTOR.

(a) RESTRICTIONS REGARDING INVOLVEMENT IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ENERGY SECTOR.—The Act is amended by adding after section 314 the following new section 315:

"RESTRICTIONS REGARDING INVOLVEMENT IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ENERGY SECTOR

"SEC. 315. (a) A United States person may not, directly or through an affiliate, provide transport to South Africa of a commercial quantity of crude oil or refined petroleum products. The prohibition under this subsection includes transport on a vessel of United States registry and transport on a vessel owned, directly or indirectly, by a United States person.

"(b)(1) Effective 180 days after the date of the enactment of this subsection, the Secretary of the Interior may not issue any lease pursuant to the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, the Mineral Leasing Act for Acquired Lands, the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, or the Geothermal Steam Act of 1970 to any national of the United States which is controlled by, or under common control with, any foreign person who—

"(A) purchases, acquires, owns, or holds any investment in South Africa; or

"(B) exports to South Africa, directly or indirectly, any crude oil or refined petroleum products.

"(2) Prior to issuing any lease referred to in paragraph (1), the Secretary of the Interior shall require an applicant for such a lease to certify that the applicant is not subject to the provisions of paragraph (1).".

(b) WAIVER OF PROHIBITION ON ISSUANCE OF LEASES.—A person affected by the prohibition under section 315(b) of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (as amended by subsection (a)) may apply to the President for a one-time waiver of the prohibition. With respect to any applicant, the President may waive the application of section 315(b) for not more than 180 days after such subsection takes effect. Such waiver may be granted only for good cause.

PART B—POLICY STATEMENTS; REPORTS; STUDIES; AND OTHER MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 121. SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING ANTITRUST INVESTIGATION OF SOUTH AFRICAN DIAMOND CARTEL, STUDY OF DIAMOND ORIGINS, AND ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION ON IMPORTATION OF SOUTH AFRICAN DIAMONDS INTO THE UNITED STATES.

It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the President should direct the Attorney General of the United States to conduct an investigation of the South African-controlled international diamond cartel in order to ascertain if any enforcement action is appropriate under the antitrust laws of the United States;

(2) the President should direct the Secretary of Commerce and the Commissioner of Customs to conduct a study to determine the feasibility of identifying at port of entry, without harm to producers and processors of diamonds outside of South Africa, the national origin of diamonds entering the United States; and

(3) the President should—

(A) ensure effective and rigorous enforcement of a prohibition on the importation into the United States of uncut diamonds of South African origin by—

(i) applying direct pressure on the Central Selling Organization in London to identify and segregate diamonds by country of origin and encouraging other nations (including diamond-producing nations) to take appropriate measures to achieve that result; and

(ii) entering into negotiations for agreements with the principal exporting nations of uncut diamonds to the United States (particularly the United Kingdom and Switzerland) to ensure that uncut South African diamonds will not be exported to the United States;

(B) pursue effective enforcement and undertake appropriate actions to obtain the identification and segregation of uncut diamonds of South African origin, provided, such enforcement and other action do not interfere with the ability of United States importers to import uncut diamonds of other countries of origin despite any unknowing importation of unidentified uncut South African diamonds which may occur; and

(C) direct the Secretary of the Treasury to submit a report on the status of the effort to identify and segregate uncut South African diamonds to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act and every 180 days thereafter.

SEC. 122. SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING SOUTH AFRICAN CONSULATES AND APPROVAL OF VISAS.

It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) South Africa has effectively banned 19 major anti-apartheid organizations, forbade the major trade union federation, COSATU, from engaging in political activities, and denied permission for travel to the United States to numerous South Africans;

(2) the repression by South Africa of domestic and foreign media has prevented the free flow of information essential to the advance of any national dialogue between the government and the nonwhite majority which actively opposes apartheid, and has restricted the ability of the foreign press to report developments in South Africa;

(3) the President should immediately close two of South Africa's consulates general, eliminate all honorary consuls which South Africa has in the United States, and forbid South Africa to expand the staffing of its embassy beyond the level of January 1, 1988; and

(4) approval of temporary United States visas, especially to South African government personnel, should be granted on a case-by-case basis only after close scrutiny of the South African Government's record of allowing South African citizens, particularly those who are members of anti-apartheid organizations, to travel to the United States.

SEC. 123. STUDY OF MEASURES TO REDUCE SOUTH AFRICA'S FOREIGN EXCHANGE EARNINGS FROM GOLD.

(a) STUDY.—In consultation with other industrialized nations and international financial institutions, the President shall conduct a study of possible actions by the United States to reduce the foreign exchange earnings of South Africa which accrue through sales of gold. The President shall consider possible international and domestic consequences of any course of action and shall evaluate mechanisms to avoid or minimize any adverse effects on the United States gold mining industry.

(b) REPORT.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the President shall submit to the Congress a report of the findings of such study.

SEC. 124. REPORT ON SOUTH AFRICA'S INVOLVEMENT IN INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM.

Not less than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of State shall prepare and submit a detailed report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate concerning the extent to which the Government of South Africa has been involved in or has provided support for acts of international terrorism.

TITLE II—SANCTIONS AGAINST SOUTH AFRICAN IMPORTS INTO THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 201. PROHIBITIONS ON IMPORTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

(a) PROHIBITION ON IMPORTS.—Effective 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, section 302 of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"PROHIBITION ON IMPORTS INTO THE UNITED STATES FROM SOUTH AFRICA

"SEC. 302. (a) No article which is grown, produced, extracted, or manufactured in South Africa may be imported into the United States.

"(b) The prohibition of subsection (a) shall not apply to the import of—

"(1) any strategic mineral (including any ferroalloy thereof) with respect to which the President certifies to the Congress for purposes of this Act that the quantities of such mineral which are essential for the economy, public health, or defense of the United States are not available from alternative reliable suppliers; and

"(2) publications, including books, newspapers, magazines, films, television programming, phonograph records, video and audio tape recordings, photographs, microfilm, microfiche, posters, and similar materials.

"(c) The prohibition under subsection (a) shall not apply to imports from business enterprises in South Africa that are wholly-owned by persons economically and politically disadvantaged by apartheid.

"(d) The prohibition under subsection (a) includes—

"(1) South African krugerrands or any other gold coin minted in South Africa or offered for sale by the Government of South Africa;

"(2) uranium hexafluoride that has been manufactured from South African uranium or uranium oxide; and

"(3) fish or seafood—

"(A) purchased from a ship owned by a South African or of South African registry,

"(B) purchased from a South African,

"(C) processed in whole or part by a South African ship or person, or

"(D) stored in or shipped from South Africa.".

(b) CERTIFICATION.—The certification of the President with respect to any strategic mineral under section 303(a)(2) of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (as in effect prior to the date of the enactment of this Act) shall be effective for purposes of section 302(b)(1) of such Act as amended by this Act, unless the President rescinds or modifies such a certification.

SEC. 202. MULTILATERAL MEASURES, INCLUDING IMPORT RESTRICTIONS, TO DISMANTLE APARTHEID.

(a) NEGOTIATING AUTHORITY.—Section 401(b) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) The President, or at his direction, the Secretary of State (in consultation with the United States Trade Representative), shall, consistent with the policy under subsection (a), confer with the other industrialized democracies in order to reach cooperative agreements to impose sanctions against South Africa to bring about the complete dismantling of apartheid.

"(2) Before the 180th day after the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989, the President shall submit a report to the Congress containing—

"(A) a description of United States efforts under paragraph (1) to implement multilateral measures to bring about the complete dismantling of apartheid;

"(B) his evaluation regarding whether the efforts described in subparagraph (A) have been successful in achieving multilateral measures to bring about the complete dismantling of apartheid; and

"(C) if the efforts described in subparagraph (A) have been successful, a detailed description of economic and other measures adopted by the other industrialized countries to bring about the complete dismantling of apartheid, including an assessment of the stringency with which such measures are enforced by those countries.".

(b) UNITED NATIONS SANCTIONS.—Section 401(e) of the Act is amended by striking "It is the sense of the Congress that the President should" and inserting "The President shall".

(c) LIMITATION ON IMPORTS FROM AND CONTRACTING WITH CERTAIN FOREIGN PERSONS.—Section 402 of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"LIMITATION ON IMPORTS FROM AND CONTRACTING WITH CERTAIN FOREIGN PERSONS

"SEC. 402. (a)(1) Subject to subsection (b), effective on and after the 180th day after the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989 (or the 360th day after such date if the evaluation of the President under section 401(b)(2)(B) is affirmative), to the extent that a foreign person takes significant commercial advantage of any sanction or prohibition imposed by or under this Act, the President shall impose not less than one of the penalties under paragraph (2).

"(2) The President may impose one or both of the following penalties under paragraph (1):

"(A) Limit the importation into the United States of any product or service of the foreign person.

"(B) Restrict the foreign person from contracting with departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the United States Government.

"(3) For purposes of applying this subsection—

"(A) the European Community shall be treated as being a single industrialized democracy; and

"(B) any limitation imposed under paragraph (2)(A) shall, to the extent possible, offset the value of the significant commercial advantage obtained by the foreign person.

"(b)(1) The President may waive the application of subsection (a) with respect to foreign persons of an industrialized democracy that is party to an agreement that has entered into force with respect to the United States under section 401.

"(2) The President shall revoke, for such time and subject to such conditions as he considers appropriate, a waiver made under paragraph (1) if the President finds that the industrialized democracy that is party to the agreement in force under section 401 is not adequately enforcing the measures provided for under the agreement.

"(3) The annual report required under section 607(b)(4) shall include, with respect to the period covered by the report—

"(A) an evaluation of the extent to which the import restrictions, if any, provided for under each agreement in force under section 401 are being enforced by the industrialized democracy concerned and the effect of such enforcement; and

"(B) the reasons for each waiver and revocation made under paragraphs (1) and (2).".

SEC. 203. REFERRAL IN THE HOUSE OF JOINT RESOLUTIONS PERTAINING TO IMPORT RESTRICTIONS.

Section 602(a)(2) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2)(A) A joint resolution, other than a joint resolution referred to in subparagraph (B), shall, upon introduction, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

"(B) A joint resolution under—

"(i) section 311(b), if the joint resolution suspends or modifies any import restriction in effect under title III, section 402(a), 501(c), or 504(b);

"(ii) section 401(d), if the joint resolution approves an agreement encompassing any import restriction measure; or

"(iii) section 501(d), if the joint resolution would enact any import restriction under section 501(c) shall, upon introduction, be jointly referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.".

SEC. 204. REPORTS ON UNITED STATES IMPORTS FROM MEMBER STATES OF THE COUNCIL FOR MUTUAL ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE.

Section 502 of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"REPORTS ON UNITED STATES IMPORTS FROM MEMBER STATES OF THE COUNCIL FOR MUTUAL ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 502. Beginning 30 days after the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989, and every 30 days thereafter, the President, through the Secretary of Commerce, shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report setting forth the average amounts of imports of coal or any strategic and critical material entering the United States from each member country and observer country of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (C.M.E.A.).".

SEC. 205. PROGRAM TO REDUCE DEPENDENCE UPON IMPORTATION OF STRATEGIC MINERALS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

Section 504(b) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) The President shall develop a program to reduce the dependence, if any, of the United States on the importation from South Africa of the materials identified in the report submitted under subsection (a). In the development of such program, the President shall determine (in consultation with knowledgeable individuals in industry, government, and academia) whether, to what extent, and in what time period, adequate quantities of such materials could reasonably be obtained from (A) alternative reliable domestic and foreign sources, and (B) improved and effective methods of manufacturing, substitution, conservation, recovery, and recycling. Such determination shall include consideration of the quality and cost of such materials.

"(2) Not more than 270 days after the date of the enactment of the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989, the President shall submit a report to the Congress concerning the program under paragraph (1), particularly the respective roles in the implementation of such program of the Federal Government, users of such materials, and other affected persons. On February 1, 1991, and on February 1 of each subsequent year until the termination of sanctions under this Act, the President shall submit a report to the Congress concerning progress in implementing such program.".

SEC. 206. PREVENTING CIRCUMVENTION OF UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS.

Within 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act and at such times thereafter as are appropriate, the President, or the designee of the President, shall confer with the governments of the African "frontline" states regarding the content and implementation of appropriate measures to prevent the circumvention by South Africa of the import restrictions on South African products placed in effect by the United States under the authority of this Act.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 301. TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.

(a) AMENDMENTS TO THE TABLE OF CONTENTS.—

(1) Section 2 of the Act relating to the table of contents for title III is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE III—MEASURES BY THE UNITED STATES TO UNDERMINE APARTHEID

"Sec. 301. Prohibition on investment in South Africa.
"Sec. 302. Prohibition on imports into the United States from South Africa.
"Sec. 303. Prohibition of exports of South Africa from the United States.
"Sec. 304. Prohibition on United States intelligence and military cooperation with South Africa.
"Sec. 305. Prohibition on loans to the Government of South Africa.

(2) The table of contents in section 2 of the Act is further amended—

(A) by amending the item relating to section 207 to read as follows:

"Sec. 207. Prohibition on assistance to any person or group engaging in 'necklacing'.".

(B) by striking the item relating to section 212;

(C) by amending the items relating to sections 402 and 502, respectively, to read as follows:

"Sec. 402. Limitation on imports from and contracting with certain foreign persons.
"Sec. 502. Reports on United States imports from member states of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance."; and

(D) by adding after the item relating to section 606 the following items:

"Sec. 607. Coordinator of South Africa sanctions.
"Sec. 608. Interagency coordinating committee on South Africa.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS TO THE ACT.—

(1) Section 602(a)(1) and 602(b)(1) of the Act are amended by striking "318(b),".

(2) Section 602(c) is amended by striking paragraph (2) and redesignating paragraphs "(3)" and "(4)" as paragraphs "(2)" and "(3)", respectively.

(3) Section 501(c) of the Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "or other measures" after "additional measures"; and

(B)(i) by striking paragraph (2) and (4);

(ii) by inserting "and" at the end of paragraph (1);

(iii) by striking "; and" and inserting in lieu thereof a period at the end of paragraph (3); and

(iv) by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph "(2)".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 302. EFFECTIVE DATE.

Except as otherwise provided, this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

ADULT DAY HEALTH CARE LEGISLATION

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to commend Senator BRADLEY for his foresight in sponsoring the Medicare Adult Day Health Care Amendments of 1989. I am pleased to cosponsor this legislation, which would establish Medicare coverage for up to 100 days each year of health and rehabilitative day care for Medicare eligible persons over the age of 18.

Throughout our consideration of legislation to protect older Americans from catastrophic health costs, we heard repeatedly that the greatest financial risk borne by the elderly is long-term care. We also know from many years of hearings and countless studies that the aged and disabled strongly prefer any form of long-term care that will allow them to stay at home, rather than be institutionalized. Adult day health care is one of several essential community-based long-term care services, such as home health and home supportive services, which are responsive to these needs and preferences of the elderly.

We have taken some significant steps toward improved coverage with the catastrophic care legislation signed by the President on July 1 of last year. In that legislation, we improved the short-term home health and skilled nursing facility benefits provided by Medicare. Nonetheless, like Hercules in his struggle against Hydra, Congress faces a monster with more than one head. Providing for short-term acute care costs still leaves American families facing the more common financial catastrophe of a long term, chronic illness.

Mr. President, the typical recipient of adult day health care services is a woman over 73 years of age with an income of less than $500 each month, who relies upon her children to care for her around the clock. Adult day health care centers offer critical daily services which help family caregivers to support their disabled loved ones at home, by freeing them to work and attend to other business away from home during the daytime. Without this assistance, thousands of families simply wear down and can no longer maintain their aged relatives at home. When family caregiving structures collapse, research shows that families must seek more expensive institutional care for their impaired loved ones.

Mr. President, this legislation could save Medicare money, by diverting people from nursing home care costing $50 to $60 a day, to less expensive day health care at a cost of $35 a day. Adult day health care can in fact meet the health and rehabilitative needs of many persons who would otherwise require care in a skilled nursing facility, however, I think we should be careful in drawing any conclusions about cost savings from this benefit. I say this because of the very high occupancy rates that characterize most States' nursing homes, and because of the long queues of beneficiaries awaiting entry to those nursing homes. The fact is, we have done such a poor job of financing long term care services that new benefits are needed simply to meet unmet needs—and may not produce measurable financial savings.

Yet, for thousands of elderly and disabled persons and their families, adult day health can make a tremendous difference in the quality of their lives. I believe it is wise public policy to target scarce Medicare resources to support unpaid family caregivers who now assume the great bulk of long-term care responsibilities in the United States.

I urge my colleagues to study and consider this thoughtful legislation, and to join me in a commitment to find a solution to the problem of long-term care costs in the near future.●

QUICK ACTION NEEDED ON REFUGEE LEGISLATION

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to express my sponsorship and support for S. 489, introduced March 1, for the purpose of relieving the plight of refugees who are arriving in much larger numbers from the Soviet Union. This is a goal we have pressed toward for years. Now that it is in sight, it is essential that the United States hold up its end by providing the needed opportunities for refugees to enter the United States, without undue delays.

Senators KENNEDY and KASTEN have taken the lead in formulating this timely and needed legislation. It is a bipartisan effort. It provides not just for an increase in refugee admission numbers, but also for the funds needed to bring the additional refugees to the United States during the current year. It would do so by drawing on funds already appropriated to the State legalization assistance grants that have been subject to a proposed rescission by the administration.

This bill provides an excellent way to address the backlog in processing Soviet refugees without hampering the refugee situation in other countries and without reversing longstanding refugee policy. In my view, it will offer a much needed breathing space to give us the opportunity to establish an appropriate, long-term refugee strategy.

Mr. President, this issue is one of tremendous concern to those who recognize the foreign policy implications that it holds for the United States. It also is an issue that calls for the involvement and direction of the administration if we are to find a long-term solution. I have written to President George Bush and to Secretary of State James Baker to let them know of my concerns and to enlist their support for an appropriate solution. I sincerely hope that we can count on the administration to work closely with the Congress on this issue, and I strongly urge the support of my colleagues for this legislation. I commend Senator KASTEN and Senator KENNEDY for their leadership and their hard work on this bill. I ask that my letters on this subject to President Bush and Secretary of State Baker be printed in the RECORD at this point.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC, February 10, 1989.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to express my concern about the new practice of denying refugee status to some of the Soviet Jews arriving in Rome. I believe our refugee criteria should continue to recognize the history of persecution that is the compelling motivation for Jews and other minorities to leave the Soviet Union.

It seems especially unfortunate that these changes come at the very time we appear close to the goal of freer migration from the Soviet Union. There is danger that this victory for our policies and efforts will be undermined by these disruptions in our own refugee processing. If additional numbers are needed, they should be sought in consultation with the Congress, rather than denying refugee status to some or transferring numbers away from others whose needs are equally urgent.

America's commitment to refugees is one of our most honored traditions. I hope you will reaffirm our policy that this humanitarian commitment will be maintained.

With every good wish.

Ever sincerely,

CLAIBORNE PELL.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC, February 10, 1989.

Hon. JAMES A. BAKER III,
Secretary of State, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you know from our discussions during your confirmation hearings, I am concerned about recent developments in our refugee policies related to the increased arrivals of Soviet Jews in Rome. I know some of these actions took place before your confirmation, and I hope you will give the situation your urgent attention.

There are two aspects to the problem. One is the question of admissions numbers.

Here I believe the Congress would be responsive to increasing the numbers to take care of those now able to leave the Soviet Union, without transferring numbers away from the Indochinese whose needs are also urgent. I hope you will move quickly, in cooperation with the Attorney General and the Department of Health and Human Services, to consult with the Congress on the need for additional numbers keyed to the emergent situation of increased arrivals in Rome. Funding will also be needed, but with some belt-tightening I believe we can meet our obligations to all these refugees without reducing our commitment to any of those who are of special humanitarian concern to our country.

Related to this is the recent practice of denying refugee status to some Soviet Jews in Rome. This action seems particularly unfortunate, since it comes at the very time Gorbachev is allowing increased numbers to depart—a major human rights achievement for our policy which should not be undermined by disruptions in our own processing. Our refugee criteria should continue to recognize the history of persecution that is the compelling motivation for Jews and other minorities to leave the Soviet Union.

With every good wish.

Ever sincerely,

CLAIBORNE PELL.[1]

AN AMERICAN OPPORTUNITY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today I am inserting in the RECORD a thought-provoking article by Mary Hatwood Futrell, president of the National Education Association, that recently appeared in the Washington Post. The article clearly demonstrates the need for bilingual education programs. America is currently experiencing the second largest wave of immigration in its history. In the last 8 years over 14 million immigrants have entered the United States, 90 percent of whom are from Third World nations. This is quite a drastic change from just 100 years ago when 90 percent of all immigrants entering our Nation were Europeans.

America's public schools are greatly affected by this dramatic increase of Third World immigrants. Over the last decade, the number of public school students with limited proficiency in English has risen by more than 250 percent. Today, nearly 3 million immigrant children are in our Nation's classrooms, and it is not unusual to find students with a single school district speaking anywhere from 50 to 115 different native languages.

Mr. President, these children face tremendous barriers to learning. Bilingual education programs are very helpful to these immigrant children who are not proficient in English. As the article points out, these programs teach children English while allowing them to maintain ties to family traditions and customs, without resulting in any embarrassment.

Mr. President, I believe that we must have successful bilingual programs which build bridges of understanding between America and foreign countries. Unfortunately, as this article states, bilingual programs are extremely understaffed. The shortage of teachers in these programs is an embarrassment to our Nation, especially with the ever-growing importance of knowing more than one language in today's global society.

Immigration does present some problems, but with proper educational programs, the latest wave of immigrants can create an opportunity to make America a more diverse and knowledgeable Nation.

Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 26, 1989]

AN AMERICAN OPPORTUNITY

(By Mary Hatwood Futrell)

America is currently experiencing the second largest wave of immigration in our nation's history. Over 14 million men, women, and children from other countries have entered the United States over the last eight years.

Just 100 years ago, 90 percent of all immigrants entering the United States were Europeans. Today, 90 percent are from Third World nations. In 1986, Asians accounted for nearly half the immigration into the U.S., Latin Americans 40 percent, and Europeans 5 percent.

Obviously, this has implications for America's public schools. Over the last 10 years alone, the number of public school students with limited proficiency in English has risen more than 250 percent. Today, it's not at all unusual to find students within a single school district speaking anywhere from 50 to 115 different native languages.

In all, nearly three million immigrant children are in America's classrooms today. They are there to learn English, math, science, geography, and history. Equally important, they are there to learn about the United States, our society, our way of life.

But these children face unique barriers to learning. In addition to language, they are particularly disadvantaged by standardized tests and the grouping of students by "ability"—two widely used educational practices that reflected language proficiency more than learning potential.

Clearly, immigrant students must rapidly become English proficient—and not solely for academic work. They need English to participate fully in extracurricular activities and social events. These interactions are an important part of the larger experience of school, and ultimately of American life.

For students who are not English proficient, bilingual education programs can play a very important role. These programs help students learn academic subjects in their native language at the same time they're learning English.

Bilingual programs offer youngsters who have suffered discrimination for looking or speaking differently the opportunity to learn English without embarrassment. And they allow immigrant children to maintain ties with family customs and traditions, while adapting to their new country.

Unfortunately, bilingual programs remain notoriously understaffed. The severe shortage of bilingual teachers is a national shame, especially given the importance of knowing more than one language in today's tightly interwoven global economy.

There are those who see America's increasingly polyglot student population as an obstacle to educational quality. I see such student diversity as a wonderful opportunity. Let's take advantage of this opportunity to make our nation richer, more vibrant, and more dynamic than ever before.●

WHEN U.S. WELLS GO DRY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the New York Times recently had an article by John Sawhill, who has served under the Ford, Nixon, and Carter administrations in the area of energy.

He points out that our supplies of natural gas are somewhat limited.

I mention this because we will soon be considering acid rain legislation and trying to make a determination of what should be done to pay for applying modern technology on the use of coal, to reduce the emission of sulfurdioxide and nitrogenoxide.

For a variety of reasons, my own feeling is that the base of payment should not simply be utilities that use coal.

The Sawhill observations should be taken seriously by any of us who look beyond the next few years.

We should not be tilting utilities in the direction of more and more use of natural gas, and yet that is precisely what we will be doing if we put a tax on coal, our most abundant resource, and not on the use of oil and gas.

I ask to insert the article in the RECORD at this point, and I urge my colleagues to read the article.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 26, 1989]

WHEN U.S. WELLS GO DRY DON'T COUNT ON "COOKING WITH GAS"

(By John Sawhill)

Is the United States vulnerable to another bout of natural gas shortages like the one we experienced in the 1970's? The answer is "Yes." And if we had not had such a warm winter this year, the Northeast and the Middle Atlantic States probably would have been hit hard.

What is especially ironic about this situation is that natural gas is being touted by many as a cure-all fuel—one that can remedy not only energy problems, but environmental ones as well. The difficulty is that even if there are—as some estimates suggest—20 to 50 years worth of natural gas in the ground, it is not being explored for, found and hooked up at a rate that is sufficient to sustain even current levels of demand.

Thus, the amount of deliverable gas is dropping by 7 to 8 percent a year. And some reports indicate that reserve additions in 1988 are likely to fall to their lowest level in more than 40 years. Deliverability is declining most rapidly in the Gulf Coast area, which supplies the Northeast and Middle Atlantic States.

The increasing use of gas to heat residential and commercial structures is adding to overall demand. And new gas-fired cogeneration equipment and electric-utility capacity are springing up nationwide.

This means we may not adjust to gas shortages any better than we did in the past. For one thing, the traditional relationships between suppliers and customers have all but broken down. Many gas distribution companies refuse to make long-term commitments to buy from pipelines. Therefore not only are pipelines and producers unwilling to make investments in long-term supplies, pipelines are even shedding their current supplies to minimize take-or-pay exposure. Yet the distribution companies persist in thinking that the pipelines will have supplies available for them in a crunch.

Other distribution companies and end-users believe that the brokers and marketers that have been supplying them for the last several years will help them through a shortage. But many broker/marketers are offering the same gas packages to several customers—figuring that they can cover any over-commitment in the spot market or simply walk away from the deal. We expect the supply of gas in the spot market to diminish next winter by as much as 40 to 50 percent as nervous pipelines begin to recall supplies.

In the 1970's, the shortage was eased by gas users who switched to other fuels. But our surveys and discussions indicate that except for the 10 to 15 percent of the winter market that switches on a fairly regular basis or maintains an ongoing readiness to switch, most users have been lulled by low gas prices and reports of adequate supplies into not maintaining switching capability.

Suppliers and customers must get back together, and those customers that need supply assurance (the distribution companies and non-switchable end-users) will have to offer a price that creates or holds supplies for them. State regulations that limit distributor purchases to "least cost" sources without regard to longer-term supply security need to be modified, and distributors must begin to distinguish, if they have not already, between those customers willing to pay for long-term security and those unwilling.

The pipelines and distributors, in particular, need to break their current gridlock. If distributors are not going to extend contracts and commit to take gas, then the pipelines should be able to end any remaining service obligations (and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission will need to make this clear). In all likelihood, the distributors will commit to a certain level of purchases if forced to go it alone.

In a tight market, it will be important to build additional pipeline capacity to relieve transportation bottlenecks. While changes in regulations to improve access to existing capacity will help, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission will also need to act more expeditiously on new pipeline construction applications. And producers should be given the opportunity to contract directly with pipelines and customers without fear of regulatory interference in the form of price controls or non-contractual service obligations.

We have all benefited from cheaper, more plentiful gas. But it must soon begin to reflect its true value in the market, based on its replacement cost.

The gas industry is likely to shrink, at least until new high-cost sources of supply like Canadian frontier gas and Alaskan North Slope gas come on line. Unfortunately, these projects require gas prices higher than are likely to be reached at today's crude prices and have very long lead times.

Those presenting gas as a panacea would be well advised to reconsider. We expect that gas will be no panacea at all, but an early problem for the new Administration to address.●

A SALUTE TO TEENS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, in Illinois this week, we pause to recognize our youth. The Bethany Home based in Moline, IL, has designated the week of March 6 as "Salute to Teens Week." The salute to teens celebration is an attempt to acknowledge the positive contributions teens are making in our society.

The Bethany Home has been celebrating teen week for the past 4 years, and uses this as an opportunity to raise teen self-esteem and encourage positive communications between teens and adults. This is an effort to ensure that teens grow up with a positive attitude and learn good decision-making skills necessary to reduce the incidents of teen pregnancy and substance abuse.

I commend the Bethany Home on the continued effort to provide counseling and education to young men and women, and ask my colleagues to join me in a salute to teens.●

MAKE ALLIES SHARE DEFENSE

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I would like to insert into the RECORD an article written by the chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Senator J. BENNETT JOHNSTON, which was printed on January 8, 1989, in the New York Times. The article titled, "Make Allies Share Defense: Put More Into Civilian R&D" is an important statement which should be seriously reviewed.

The United States is drifting behind many of our international competitors in basic and applied research and development. Due to poor R&D priorities over the last 8 years, the United States may find itself unable to maintain our markets both domestically and overseas.

Senator JOHNSTON points out in his article that the administration's narrow ideological constraints on commercialization of technology may have permitted Japan to lead in the commercialization of ceramics, fuel cells, and photovoltaics. The 1988 fiscal year was the first time that both the Japanese and German Governments have surpassed the United States in photovoltaics research and development, a technology which was created by the United States Space Program in the 1960's. By the 1980's, the United States had developed a domestic energy industry with over $100 million in annual sales, with over 65 percent of the technology manufactured exported overseas.

The Federal photovoltaics R&D program is a microcosm of the problems confronting the United States in all high technology areas. First, Federal R&D support dropped from $151 million in fiscal year 1989. Second, our industrial competitors, sensing a lack of U.S. resolve, increased their own Federal photovoltaics R&D programs. The result is that the potential multibillion dollar world markets that might have been dominated by the United States, may become controlled by our international competitors.

I believe the United States needs to invest in our future, and, on March 1, 1989, I introduced S. 488, which promotes multiyear research and development and joint ventures for solar and renewable energy R&D. Increasing domestic research and development both by the Federal Government and the private sector is essential. If we do not, the United States may fall irrevocably behind, and that is unacceptable. The article by Senator JOHNSTON deserves serious consideration.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 8, 1989]

MAKE ALLIES SHARE DEFENSE

(By Bennett Johnston)

WASHINGTON.—The 101st Congress will likely challenge the Bush administration to spend less overseas to defend our allies and more to defend our own economic future. The alternative is to witness a continued erosion not only in commercial competitiveness but in our military-industrial base as well.

The problem is this: We are allocating an ever larger share of Federal research and development to defense—defense of our trading partners along with ourselves. This enables our partners to plow proportionately more money into civilian research and development.

Unquestionably, Washington pays more than its fair share of the costs of defending the free world. Defense Department figures show we spend $1,164 per capita on the military, while West Germany spends $454 and Japan only $163. We still pay to keep an overseas force of one million, the majority being civilians and dependents, not troops.

The adverse impact of this burden is becoming increasingly evident. Since 1981, Federal spending for civilian research and development has dropped 27 percent in real terms, compared with a 78 percent rise for the military. In the previous 15 years, R&D was split about equally between civilian and military purposes. Today, we spend about half as much on civilian research and development (including NASA) as on military.

Specifically, 69 percent of Federal R&D is now devoted to defense. The corresponding figure for Japan is only 4.5 percent and for West Germany 12.5 percent, according to the National Science Foundation. Moreover, as a percentage of gross national product, Japan and West Germany each spend half again as much as the United States on civilian technology public and private.

In the past, military technologies spun off a host of civilian products, such as computers, semiconductors and commercial jetliners. But today the spinoff has reversed direction. Commercial technology is now driving military innovation.

Finally, the huge increase in military R&D in the Reagan years went far more into development than into research. Funding for the development of specific weapons increased in real terms by 73 percent between 1981 and 1987. But spending for military research known as "technology base" rose in real terms by a minute 0.3 percent in that period.

How did we reach this point? First, in the budget squeeze on civilian agencies, research and development was an early victim.

Second, Administration spending on R&D has been driven by a narrow ideology of leaving commercial decisions to the marketplace. Generally, if Government-supported research produces a technology with some commercial potential, Administration ideology dictates a cutback. As a result, we tend to produce ideas that other nations, particularly Japan, then develop into such new products as advanced ceramics, fuel cells and photovoltaics. The Bush administration should temper this rigid ideology with common sense.

Perhaps worst of all, a commercial sector that becomes uncompetitive eventually withers away and is unavailable as a military-industrial base. Thus, ironically enough, the Defense Science Board just released a report urging the Defense Department to take a larger lead in rejuvenating the civilian technical base.

While the problem is clear, solutions are more difficult to discern. Without new revenues the Government, especially the Defense Department, can little afford to boost civilian R&D; tax credits to spur corporate research and development have proved difficult to target on vital technologies. And a more militarized Japan is suspect.

However, our trading partners can compensate us more for the defense we provide them. That compensation might help relieve budgetary pressure and enable us to fund civilian R&D at the higher levels, as a percentage of the gross national product that prevailed in the past.

The new administration must restore a balance between civilian and military R&D and more equitably share our defense burden with trading partners whose future competitiveness we now subsidize. Not only trade but our future national security is at stake.●

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11:30 a.m. on Wednesday, March 8, 1989.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. I further ask unanimous consent that following the time for the two leaders there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEBATE ON TOWER NOMINATION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that at 11:30 a.m. the Senate go into executive session to continue debate on the Tower nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Senate will convene at 11 a.m. on tomorrow, Wednesday, March 8. Following time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business, not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each

At 11:30 a.m., the Senate will go into executive session to continue debate on the Tower nomination.

Mr. President, I think it prudent to remind my colleagues that rollcall votes are possible during tomorrow's session, and my colleagues should be aware that there could be more than one vote tomorrow depending upon if and when motions are presented for consideration.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if the Republican leader has no further business and if no other Senator is seeking recognition, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow, Wednesday, March 8, under the previous order.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 6:53 p.m., recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 8, 1989, at 11 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

GAO REPORT REVEALS FAILURES IN NAVY TRAINING

HON. TOBY ROTH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago, a 19-year-old Navy recruit died while undergoing training at the Navy Rescue Swimmer School at Pensacola, FL. His name was Lee Mirecki, a young man like many thousands who join our Armed Forces with enthusiasm, idealism and a commitment to their country.

Today, I released the results of an extensive GAO investigation of Lee Mirecki's death. The report reveals that Lee Mirecki died because of serious safety problems, and not in a freak accident, as the Navy claimed. A summary of the GAO report follows my remarks.

The GAO also found that safety problems contributed to at least 5 of the 16 other Navy training deaths which occurred during 1986 through 1988.

In addition, the GAO found defects in Navy investigation procedures that impede the Navy's ability to correct safety problems.

Finally, the GAO determined that, contrary to the Navy's claim that safety has been restored, in fact much more has to be done to improve safety in high risk training.

The bottom line is that Navy instructors still are not trained to conduct high risk training and that students still are not screened to make sure they can handle the dangers.

After months of Navy stonewalling, last June I turned to the GAO to find out why Lee Mirecki and the other Navy men had died. Specifically, I wanted to know whether safety was a problem and whether the Navy was properly managing its training. The entire Wisconsin congressional delegation endorsed my request.

From GAO's report, I conclude that Lee Mirecki's death was a tragedy waiting to happen. He was not qualified for this dangerous course, and was confronted with instructors who were not properly trained or effectively supervised. He was coerced into this high risk training because the Navy had a shortage of rescue swimmers.

The Navy brass had ignored safety problems at Pensacola for months before Lee Mirecki arrived. They swept reports of problems under the rug, and did not properly review the course of training.

This GAO report is a catalog of failures by the Navy—which led to Lee Mirecki's death and others. Today I am transmitting copies of this report to the Navy, with a demand that the GAO's findings be implemented without delay. I am also asking that the Navy contact the families of those who have died in training to tell them what really happened.

I am also transmitting this report to the chairmen of the Armed Services Committees, with my strong recommendation that they exercise strict oversight to make sure the Navy complies.

In a free society, our Military Establishment depends on public trust. In this case, the Navy failed Lee Mirecki and failed the American people. it is now up to the Navy command to restore that trust, so that every American family whose son or daughter serves in the Navy has confidence that they are told the truth when a loved one dies—whether in combat or in training.

The GAO has done a superb job in this investigation. Their commitment to excellence is a shining light for all who serve in Government and I thank them for their hard work.

[GAO report to congressional requesters, March 1989]

PURPOSE

On March 2, 1988, Airman Recruit Lee Mirecki died while undergoing training at the Navy's Rescue Swimmer School in Pensacola, Florida. Since January 1986, 16 other Navy personnel have died while involved in training activities. Annually, about 800,000 Navy personnel receive formal training.

The Wisconsin congressional delegation requested that GAO answer the following questions:

How and why did the Mirecki incident occur?

Has the Navy done enough to see that such an incident cannot reoccur?

How adequately was the Mirecki incident investigated?

Were safety problems present in the other Navy training deaths?

BACKGROUND

Lee Mirecki entered the Navy under a program that guaranteed him training as an aviation anti-submarine warfare operator. When he arrived at Aircrew Candidate School after recruit training, he was informed that he had to complete the Rescue Swimmer School.

After panicking during a lifesaving exercise, Mirecki decided to withdraw from the school. He then underwent some medical reviews to determine his fitness to continue the training. Although a flight surgeon determined that he was unfit to continue because of a water-related fear, he was re-enrolled in the course.

During the same lifesaving exercise, Mirecki again panicked. This time, the instructors forced him to continue. He became unconscious, and the instructors removed him from the water and began resuscitation efforts. Subsequent medical treatment failed to revive him.

The cause of death was diagnosed as heart failure brought on by extreme fright, fatigue, and lack of air. This incident led to a series of investigations and resulted in a variety of disciplinary actions against 10 individuals.

RESULTS IN BRIEF

An intimidating, nonvolunteer atmosphere and inadequate internal controls at the school and its superior commands contributed to Mirecki's death. In addition, the initial investigations were flawed, although subsequent investigations produced information that allowed action to be taken against those involved. Two later training reviews helped to improve training safety, but weaknesses remain.

Safety concerns were involved in several of the other 16 training-related deaths. The Navy did not always perform the required investigations into these deaths.

GAO'S ANALYSIS

An intimidating atmosphere existed at the rescue swimmer school

Because of command pressure to produce more graduates, the Rescue Swimmer School became less selective of the students it enrolled and increased the importance of discouraging voluntary attrition. These factors helped to create an intimidating, nonvolunteer atmosphere at the school. As a result, it enrolled students who had little chance of success and then intimidated them into remaining in the course by reminding students of the negative career consequences that would result if they withdrew.

A lack of effective internal controls

The atmosphere at the school combined with inadequate internal controls allowed a series of events to occur that led to the death of Lee Mirecki.

First, Mirecki was not a good candidate for rescue swimmer training. He did not volunteer, did not receive any psychological screening for duty as a rescue swimmer, and was not a strong swimmer. In addition, he was not informed that rescue swimmer training was required until he arrived at the Aircrew Candidate School. Second, Mirecki was pressured into remaining in the Rescue Swimmer School after he panicked in his first class. Third, he was allowed to re-enroll after a flight surgeon had determined that he was not physically qualified. Fourth, the instructors forced Mirecki to continue the training exercise, despite his pleas to quit.

Those events occurred because the school did not effectively manage its operations and staff. For example, the school did not adequately supervise and train instructors, had an inadequate student feedback system, inadequately screened students, and did not have a system for alerting instructors to special student problems.

The lack of effective internal controls at the school was compounded by inadequate command oversight. Higher level commands did not (1) pay sufficient attention to high attrition and rollback rates, (2) follow up on injury and medical incidents, (3) establish safety audit/inspection responsibilities, and (4) provide adequate curriculum review.

Initial investigations into the Mirecki incident were inadequate

The Mirecki incident triggered a number of investigations. The Chief of Naval Air Training convened a Judge Advocate General Manual investigation. This initial investigation was hastily done and narrowly focused and did not thoroughly analyze the circumstances of Mirecki's death.

A Naval Investigative Service investigation began after a tip was received alleging that the death may have been caused by instructor misconduct and the Navy was attempting to cover it up. GAO found that the investigation did not sufficiently address the issue of an alleged cover-up and contained numerous flaws.

Navy officials found both investigations to be inadequate and directed a supplemental Judge Advocate General Manual investigation and reopened the Naval Investigative Service investigation. The results of these later investigations were used as the basis for disciplinary charges and actions against those involved.

Command actions have improved safety, but more needs to be done

The actions resulting from the Rescue Swimmer School review and the command-wide review contributed to improving training safety. However, GAO concluded that additional changes are still needed to clarify policies, eliminate coercion, improve instructor selection and training, and improve internal controls.

Death investigations need to be improved

Navy regulations call for up to three independent investigations of a death to determine whether safety issues were involved and identify needed corrective actions, determine accountability, and ensure that the death is not due to criminal action. GAO found that these investigations were not always performed as required. Also, the ability of these investigations, as presently conducted, to identify and address safety issues is questionable. In addition, the system for disseminating information learned from death investigations needs improvement.

RECOMMENDATIONS

GAO recommends that the Chief of Naval Education and Training take several specific steps to address the issues raised in this report.

GAO also recommends that the Secretary of the Navy review the regulations and procedures applicable to death investigations to clarify under what circumstances investigations should be performed, who should perform them, what their focus should be, and how the results should be disseminated.

BALBOA NAVAL HOSPITAL

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, in times of many troubled health care systems. I would like to bring your attention to a medical success story in the San Diego area. I would also like to commend the fine staff of Balboa Naval Hospital, and their commanding officer, Capt. Carl Wesolowski. Given the status of military health care, Balboa stands as a role model for the entire military health care system. I would like to share with my colleagues excerpts from this article which describes in further detail the first anniversary of the new Balboa Naval Hospital. This article by Mr. Robert Dietrich, appeared in the San Diego Tribune on January 31, 1989.

NEW NAVAL HOSPITAL CELEBRATES FIRST ANNIVERSARY, PATIENT "BOOM"

(By Robert Dietrich)

Capt. Carl Wesolowski, who commands the nation's largest naval medical center, served hamburgers to some of the 3,000-member staff of San Diego Naval Hospital yesterday as they celebrated the first anniversary of the institution's new $260 million facility.

"It wouldn't have worked without them," the captain said, "and we are doing things we weren't doing a year ago—we're increasing access to medical care."

The new hospital, in Balboa Park's Florida Canyon, has a daily patient load of 2,000—twice the number that were treated at the facility it replaced. The original Naval Hospital in Balboa Park was begun in the 1920s and most of its buildings are now being razed. The site was transferred to the city in a land-swap negotiation.

Wesolowski acknowledged that the hospital could not begin to meet the medical needs of all the estimated 400,000 San Diego County military personnel, retired personnel and dependents entitled to care there. But he said breakthroughs in medical administration have allowed him to expand patient loads

"We expanded our (in-hospital) primary-care clinic by adding civilian doctors to the staff," he said. "In June 1987, we were seeing 50 primary-care patients a day. Now we are seeing 200—and that is seven days a week."

Primary-care clinics in Tierrasanta and the South Bay each see an additional 200 to 300 patients a day, he added.

"Our specialty clinics have raised the daily patient load from 1,000 a day to 2,000," he said. "We recently reached an in-patient population of 427—and that includes retirees and their dependents."

Wesolowski also gave the Navy's civilian physician partnership program—authorized in 1987—high marks in expanding care for military beneficiaries.

THANKS TO GREGORY M. GILL

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, it is all to infrequent that we stop to thank the staff of those people who make this institution run. I would like to do just that today, to recognize and say thanks to a member of my staff, Gregory M. Gill, who is leaving us to take up a great challenge as drug policy coordinator for Prince George's County, MD.

Greg joined my staff more than 5 years ago, after working for the Maryland State Senate for 3 years. He has served in all his time with me as an associate staff member for the Appropriations Committee, with special concentration on two Subcommittees: Labor, Health and Human Services, Education and District of Columbia.

Every one who has met Greg and worked with him has been impressed with his commitment, his humor and with the breadth of knowledge he has developed about Government programs ranging from AIDS research to Head Start. He has made an important contribution to our country's domestic agenda. Like most staff members, however, that contribution is known only to a few. Greg has been an invaluable advisor, right arm and friend to me.

Now he faces even greater challenges. The drug epidemic is the most serious problem affecting our region. Greg has been asked by our country executive to coordinate all phases of our local fight against drugs. The future of so many young people depend on his efforts.

I know he is up to this new challenge, and I hope all my colleagues will join me in thanking Greg Gill for his contributions and wishing him Godspeed.

END OF COMMUNISM IN EUROPE?

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I insert the enclosed article, "End of Communism in Eastern Europe?" by my constituent, Mr. Arthur Burck, in Extensions of Remarks:

[From the Palm (FL) Beach Post, Oct. 23, 1988]

END OF COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE?

(By Arthur Burck)

In touring the six nations on the Danube River during recent weeks, my wife and I observed conditions that could portend the beginning of the end of communism in Eastern Europe.

It is coincidental that just after the end of World War II in 1945, I visited these very same nations at a time when I concluded that it was inevitable that the Soviet occupation forces would bring lasting communism to five of these nations—Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria—thereby slamming shut an Iron Curtain.

Our trip just happened to be at a time when, as a possible consequence of Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika, the troubled economies of Yugoslavia, Hungary and Czechoslovakia were in ferment, leading to turmoil among the communist leaders that in time could undermine communism in the Eastern Bloc, especially since despotic Rumania and Bulgaria also are ripe for similar turmoil.

When World War II ended, the major obstacle to a lasting peace was the question whether the six nations in the Danube basin would lose their independence by becoming communist satellites of the Soviet Union. (Austria slipped out of the Soviet noose in 1955 and today is a thriving showplace of capitalistic democracy.) In October 1945, Sen. Claude Pepper, then a leader in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, embarked on a five-week investigative tour of these nations, and the U.S. Army ordered me, an Army captain stationed in Rome awaiting return to my civilian position as a Wall Street lawyer, to assist Sen. Pepper as special aide.

We spent days in intensive conversations with communist leaders—Marshal Josip Broz Tito, as house guests in his Belgrade palace, Field Marshal Ivan S. Koniev in Viennta, Austria, Field Marshal Klementiy Voroshilov in Budapest, Hungary, as well as countless Soviet officials of lesser stature.

One fact emerged crystal clear. It was that nothing could dissuade the U.S.S.R. from dominating these nations. Invariably they explained their belief that their hold over these nations was indispensible to Soviet security: Since time immemorial Russia has been invaded through these states by the Swedes, Poles, Napoleon, the Kaiser and Hitler, leaving the U.S.S.R. with 20 million dead in World War II alone.

Our recent trip to these very same countries was under vastly different circumstances—aboard a luxury Soviet riverboat, the M.S. Ukraina, that my wife Rutilia and I boarded on Sept. 28 at the Russian port of Ixmail near the mouth of the Danube River. We then proceeded upstream, stopping at all of these countries, until we arrived at Vienna after 1,645 miles on the incredibly beautiful Danube.

COMMUNISM VS. CULTURE

My first shock came at Bucharest, Rumania. Untouched by the war, Bucharest in 1945 was renowned as the "Paris of East Europe." Today it is unbelievably dreary, run-down, filthy and unkept, with scarcities in quality consumer goods that, in comparision, make Moscow shops seem like Worth Avenue. Most of the charming "old town" has been bulldozed and replaced by sprawling, huge office buildings for the communist bureaucracy. It is a damning indictment of what happens when communism takes over a mature, sophisticated city of beauty and culture.

Then in Yugoslavia were found an economy near collapse: inflation over 200 percent, unemployment 15 percent, $21 billion in foreign debt. By comparision, even foundering Argentina looks good. Riots and strikes were cropping up in some areas as Communist political leaders jockeyed to improve their position.

On the surface beautiful Budapest, fully recovered from the war damage that destroyed 60 percent, seems happy, relaxed, ebullient and communism's entrepreneur capital of capitalism that once gave it the reputation for an "economic miracle."

COMMUNIST LEADERS ON EDGE

But behind the facade is widespread poverty. A third of Hungarians survive on negligible or substandard income of less than $100 per month while inflation and unemployment soar.

Struggling to find solutions, Communist leaders are considering shutting down the inefficient state-owned heavy industries and returning workers to farms that were taken away from them when state-owned farms were the "in" thing in the early days of socialist takeover. Others talk of selling a third of businesses to Western capitalists and other capitalistic moves that might reinvigorate the economy. In the meantime there are strikes, riots and other disturbances that keep Communist leaders on edge.

For similar reasons, Czechoslovakia is like a quiescent volcano that may erupt at any time. It was just 20 years ago that Czech reformers took the lead with their own programs of perestroika, but they paid the price for being ahead of the times when Soviet tanks rolled in and replaced reformers with hard-liners who in recent turbulence were replaced by other hardliners.

It was a pleasure to end the trip in Vienna. In 1945, Vienna was one of the grubbiest of cities—40 percent damaged and with its defeated population spiritless and impoverished. Today it is hard to find a more beautiful and prosperous city. If one needs to be convinced concerning the total superiority over communism of democracy and a free-enterprise economy, the comparison is startling when one weighs the postwar progress made by Vienna compared with the communist capitals.

Since Vienna is so close to the borders of Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, undoubtedly it serves as a beacon for dissident communists to come there to compare.

THE WALDHEIM VIEW

I discussed this with Kurt Waldheim, president of the Republic of Austria, in an extensive meeting Rutilia and I had with him in the Hofburg palace, and he assured that Vienna and Austria would not ignore what is happening elsewhere in Eastern Europe. He emphasized that America must play a more active role, reminding us that "both World Wars had their start in Central Europe, and yet most Americans pay little attention to what is happening here; they focus on the more populous nations."

The transition from communism will be no easy task. In every country there are entrenched bureaucrats who will fight to preserve the status quo. Moreover, the concept that socialism-communism is no longer the wave of the future is still not fully comprehended by most people.

In this fast-changing world so filled with immediate problems, it is easy to overlook what historians may eventually assess as the most significant development of our times. It is that on the economic front there has been complete and total victory over socialism and its offshoot, communism.

It was not always clear that victory would be ours. Those of us who grew up in the Great Depression remember the arguments from a surprisingly large and varied section of American life that communism-socialism was the wave of the future.

FRANCE'S SOCIALIST FLING

Indeed, as recent as the early 1980s socialism was still on the move. The socialist government of France then took over 95 percent of the banking industry and many giant industrial firms, so that government was in control of most of the 20 largest corporations.

Moreover, 17 of the 50 largest industrials in Western Europe—and of course everything in Eastern Europe—were government-owned, including eight of the top 10 in Italy and basic industries in leading democracies such as Britain, Sweden and Austria.

In recent years the tide has turned. France, Britain and other nations have been busy returning many of these big companies to private ownership—"privatization." Why? Experience confirmed the fact that big businesses, already burdened by huge and inflexible bureaucracies, became even more stagnant under the heavy hand of government bureaucrats.

The industrial units of communist nations, of course, remain shackled to massive government bureaucracies. Nevertheless, in the first several decades of the postwar period, the vigor of the Soviet economy surprised many Western economists.

But gradually over the past decade the Soviet economic engine has been malfunctioning.

Today, the Achilles heel of the U.S.S.R. is its stagnating economy.

Mr. Gorbachev therefore faces the mind-boggling task of implementing a thorough reorganization of Soviet industry, a job of unprecedented difficulty and seemingly insuperable challenges. If Mr. Gorbachev fails, freedom is unlikely to come to the Balkan satellites. What happened to Czechoslovakia in 1968 and Hungary in 1955 when Soviet tanks brutally moved in to quell freedom is again the likely scenario if Mr. Gorbachev loses.

GLASNOST AND THE REFUSENIKS

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, with so much attention focused on the processing and absorption of the increased rate of Soviet emigration and refugee application to the United States as well as the perception that glasnost has produced a society where Soviet citizens are now accorded human rights, it is easy to overlook the many refuseniks who remain waiting in an atmosphere of ever increasing hostility and anti-Semitism. While glasnost has loosened many of the restrictions in Soviet society, including the right to emigrate, most visa applications are granted to those who have recently applied. This leaves the refuseniks, who have been denied many times over for a host of poor reasons, as political pawns to be used as concessions when negotiating with the West. Additionally, glasnost has allowed the spawning of anti-Semitic groups like Pamyat making the need for emigration all the more urgent. We must continue to press the Soviet Union to go beyond superficial concessions and make true human rights advances as agreed upon in the recent concluding document of the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

I rise today, International Women's Day, in order to make our community aware of the actions of a select group of women who are in desperate need of our help. For the next 3 days, the Jewish Women Against Refusal [JEWAR] will be conducting their third annual hunger strike in protest of the Soviet Union's continued refusal to grant them exit visas. Many of these women, who have been refuseniks for more than a decade, are waiting to be reunited with their families. I am compelled to insert the statement of these women, on the eve of their hunger strike, into the RECORD because it will reinvigorate us all to continue the fight.

STATEMENT BY REFUSENIK WOMEN ON THE EVE OF THEIR HUNGER STRIKE

As in the past two years, refusenik women declare a three day hunger strike on March 8, International Women's Day.

There have been certain improvements in the problem of emigration throughout 1987 and 1988. However, there is still no legal mechanism for solving the problem. This accordingly affects the fate of people tragically. Repeated promises by Soviet authorities to line the problem up with their international commitments remain empty words.

The Soviet authorities have now divided the problem of emigration into two spheres: one is for people who apply to emigrate for the first time and the other is the release of refuseniks. Thousands of people who first apply are allowed to go rather quickly, while refuseniks remain an object of endless political bargaining at international negotiations and harassments by bureaucrats at home.

Lawlessness and arbitrary rule reign towards refuseniks detained for reasons of "state security." In most cases, they have been held beyond all reasonable time limits. Their problem is not resolved. In many cases refusal of permission for them to emigrate is confirmed, their term of waiting being extended monstrously. More and more "security" refuseniks appear, receiving refusals as hitherto without any lawful grounds.

Another big group of refuseniks are the poor relatives. Their situation is vivid testimony that the Soviet authorities refuse to comply with their own legislation. As a result, hundreds of people, including many women and children, are denied defense under law and are doomed to wage an endless overwhelming struggle against cruelty and inhuman treatment.

As a whole, the refusenik situation today exposes the old absence of legal foundation for solving the human rights problem in the Soviet Union. Accordingly, we again appeal to the Soviet and foreign public to support our just fight for observance of the right to emigrate, both for those who have been waiting for years, and for those who hope to use the right but cannot do so because there are no reliable assurances.

The right to emigrate, including essential assurance that it will be observed, has just been confirmed by the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The conference confirmed that right on January 19 and its decision was published in the Soviet Press.

Will the Soviet Union once again refuse to honor its commitments, so that we will again remain deceived victims of lawlessness and arbitrary rule?

PUERTO RICO MOVING TO DECIDE ITS FUTURE RELATIONSHIP WITH THE UNITED STATES

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have no doubt noticed the recent surge of interest in the matter of Puerto Rico's political status, a matter placed on the national agenda when President Bush elaborated on it in his February 9 address to a joint session of Congress which was nationally televised. For the further interest of my colleagues in this matter, I would like now to give all Members of Congress a brief background on this important issue that will have important implications for both the United States and Puerto Rico.

In his speech, President Bush called for a referendum in Puerto Rico to allow Puerto Ricans "to determine their own political future," adding that "personally, I strongly favor statehood." Mr. Bush has long been an advocate of statehood. I favor the existing Commonwealth status, with improvements, as does our Governor, Rafael Hernandez Colon, who proposed in January a political status plebiscite for Puerto Rico.

Gov. Hernandez Colon was later joined by the leaders of the prostatehood and proindependence parties in Puerto Rico, who agreed to seek a commitment from the United States for a final solution to the issue of the island's relationship with the United States. The Federal Government has supported Puerto Rico's right to self-determination since the days of President Harry Truman. Self-determination for Puerto Rico has been the continuing and commendable policy of the United States.

President Bush's advocacy of statehood comes despite the fact the only a minority of Puerto Ricans have expressed themselves for statehood. For example, in last November's elections, Gov. Hernandez Colon, the incumbent, pro-Commonwealth supporter, won 48.7 percent of the vote, while the prostatehood candidate won 45.8 percent. The proindependence candidate received 5.5 percent. The last time Puerto Ricans formally expressed themselves on this matter in a plebiscite held in 1967, Commonwealth predominated with 60.4 percent of the vote, while statehood received 38.9 percent, and independence, 0.6 percent.

Although President Bush came out for statehood in his February 9 speech, Gov. Hernandez Colon the next day praised the President's recognition of Puerto Rico's right to self-determination. But the Governor added that this right includes the right of the Puerto Rican people to conduct their political affairs without outside interference, without pressure from anyone in the Government of the United States making official statements concerning preferences for the political status of Puerto Rico.

The facts are that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, which came into being in 1952 through a compact between Puerto Rico and the United States, has provided the basic underpinnings for Puerto Rico's extraordinary and much admired economic and social growth, which has seen the island's per capita income soar from $121 in 1940 to over $5,000 today. Economically, the island's semiautonomous status has allowed Puerto Rico to create a thriving industrial sector of over 2,000 industrial plants, which are the mainspring of an economy whose gross domestic product [GDP] is now about $19 billion, which allows Puerto Rico to have the highest standards of living in Latin America. Puerto Rico last year bought some $7.3 billion worth of products from the United States mainland, more than that of Brazil, Argentina, Colombia, and Chile combined.

Despite the obvious economic advantages of Commonwealth status, a growing number of Puerto Ricans have come to prefer statehood in recent years. Yet, many of them somehow believe, as is maintained by local prostatehood leaders, that they can have statehood without paying Federal taxes, or somehow have Federal taxes phased in over a 20-year transition period. These leaders also maintain that Puerto Ricans need not give up Spanish as their official langauge—as it has been for nearly 500 years—or need not give up Puerto Rico's current international personality. They also claim that Congress will assume Puerto Rico's external debt of over $12 billion.

These questionable contentions should be subject to close scrutiny by Congress. The people of Puerto Rico have a right to know whether statehood will in fact be granted with such unusual conditions.

Puerto Ricans have great respect for the institution of statehood. But the majority at present feels that statehood would not be in the interest of the United States or Puerto Rico, and could plunge the now-thriving economy into deep depression if the island's special economic arrangements under Commonwealth status were eliminated, as they would be under statehood. From an island which is now an asset to the United States—and called the keystone of the Caribbean Basin initiative—Puerto Rico as a State could become heavily dependent upon U.S. taxpayers as its industrial sector atrophies without its present tax advantages.

It behooves Congress to examine these issues closely as it comes to consider President Bush's request and to help Puerto Ricans understand what it would be willing to agree to regarding each of the options to be selected by Puerto Rico through a referendum. It is also vital that Congress expedite the legislative process concerning this referendum, thereby expediting Puerto Rico's continuing right to self-determination.

JUST SAY NO TO BIG STEEL

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the February 20 edition of the Minneapolis Star Tribune contained an excellent editorial opposing an extension of voluntary restraints for the U.S. steel industry. I hope my colleagues will review the arguments opposing the extension contained in the article before making any decision on the issue. The article follows.

JUST SAY NO TO BIG STEEL

The U.S. steel industry is a junkie. It's addicted to protection from foreign competition. The industry has grown so dependent that it focuses obsessively on ensuring that its habit will continue to be fed. Another fix is due later this year. Big Steel's dealers—Congress and the White House—seem intent on providing it. That's the way addictions become perpetual—one fix at a time. The solution is to quit cold turkey. Congress and the White House should cut off the supply. If they won't do it, Big Steel's foreign competitors should.

The U.S. steel industry has enjoyed protection from foreign competitors in some form since 1969. Despite the help, the industry failed to modernize, and cost-conscious foreign competitors still captured one-quarter of the U.S. market by the early 1980s. In 1984, with Big Steel apparently on its death bed and with an election-conscious Congress clamoring to impose harsh import controls, President Reagan asked Congress to let him negotiate voluntary restrictions instead. The restrictions would last five years, giving the U.S. steel industry a chance to rebound. Congress agreed, and foreign producers went along for fear that failure to oblige would bring even more severe restrictions on their U.S. sales.

Now the "voluntary" quotas are about to expire. Surprise: Big Steel says it just can't get along without them—even though its profits are extraordinarily healthy, its mills are running at near capacity, and the decline in the dollar has made American steel among the cheapest to produce. U.S. politicians seem determined to keep the industry wrapped in dependency. During last fall's campaign, George Bush pledged his support for a continuation of the controls, and Congress seems similar inclined.

Steel-using manufacturers are incredulous at this official acquiescence to continued protectionism. They suffer the consequences: highly inflated steel prices and shortages or delayed deliveries of some steel products. Because they must pay more for steel than their foreign counterparts, U.S. manufacturers are at a competitive disadvantage both at home and abroad. Some, like Caterpiller, Inc., are fighting back by building new manufacturing plants abroad—at the expense of U.S. communities. All together, steel-users estimate that import restrictions have cost the United States significantly more manufacturing jobs than they have saved in the steel industry.

That's the flaw in protectionism. It helps some Americans but hurts others even more. For five years, steel-using manufacturers and American consumers have carried Big Steel. Now it is time for the industry to compete fairly with foreign producers or get out of the business. Congress should refuse to allow an extension of the voluntary import restrictions and President Bush should decline to negotiate one. If Bush and Congress cave in, as seems likely, foreign producers should refuse to go along.

SEA WORLD CELEBRATES ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with admiration that I rise today to pay tribute to Sea World of California as it celebrates its 25th anniversary year. Founded in 1964 on a small plot of land on Mission Bay in San Diego, Sea World with its sister parks in Cleveland, Orlando, and San Antonio—is one of the largest and most respected marine zoological parks in the world.

The history of Sea World is one of dedicated people guided by a simple philosophy and spurred by the energy common to dreamers and visionaries. In addition to presenting premier entertainment for the family, Sea World is renowned for its significant contributions to marine education and research.

Sea World's education programs have served more than 1.5 million students and teachers, offering them a unique opportunity to visit the park to study and learn first-hand about the wonders of the marine world. And, through its award-winning outreach program, Sea World has taken the mysteries of the sea to school assemblies, classrooms, libraries, and clubhouses across the western United States.

Since its founding, Sea World has sponsored an extensive stranded animal program, annually treating at its own expense as many as 650 orphaned, ill, and injured animals found on southern California beaches.

Sea World also serves as the host and major benefactor of the independent Sea World Research Institute, a nonprofit operating foundation known worldwide for its research in the areas of conservation, resource management, marine life ecology, and mariculture. Much of the institute's significant contribution to the scientific literature is attributable to the opportunity its scientists have to utilize Sea World's state-of-the-art veterinary laboratories and the park's vast collection of marine animals.

Mr. Speaker, Sea World plays a significant role in the economic health of San Diego, providing jobs to thousands of young people and students and contributing greatly to the growth and maintenance of the tourism industry. With its parent company, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Inc., Sea World and its employees represent a considerable resource not only to the community of San Diego but to the families, students, and scientists of the Nation.

I am proud to extend my congratulations to president Robert K. Gault, Jr., and his staff and associates on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Sea World of California.

A TRIBUTE TO BONNIE JOHNS

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, on November 16, 1988, Prince Georges County lost one of its most respected citizens when Bonnie Johns passed away.

For more than 20 years, Mrs. Johns served the people of our county in a variety of posts, both as a professional and as a civic activist. She was a person of great ability and compassion. In her private and public careers, she combined her training in teaching and counseling with her interest in the welfare of children.

In Prince Georges County in the 1960's, Mrs. Johns served as executive director of the United Communities Against Poverty [UCAP], an agency created during the Great Society years of the Johnson administration to combat poverty in the inner-beltway area. UCAP continues its mission today with the same commitment which Bonnie Johns first brought to it.

Bonnie Johns became most well known in Prince Georges County and throughout the Washington area for her service to the schools. In the early 1970's, she was a member of the citizens advisory committee of the county school board. In 1977, County Executive Winfield Kelly appointed Mrs. Johns to a vacancy on the board. In 1980 she was elected to that post in her own right.

During her tenure of the board, Prince Georges County was under court order and was moving toward integration of the schools. As the only black member of the school board, Mrs. Johns' profile was high and her role was difficult. Hers was always a voice of reason, often a lonely one. She engendered such respect that in her last year on the board she was elected to be the Chair.

Mrs. Johns chose not to run when she was up for reelection to the board in 1984. She wanted to devote her spare time to the pursuit of other interests. Certainly after years of night meetings, she had earned a rest. However, she was not out of the public eye for long.

For many years, Mrs. Johns was the director of consultation and education for the Prince Georges County Comprehensive Community Mental Health Center. In 1984, County Executive Parris Glendening chose her to be the first executive director of the Commission on Children and Youth. She served in that post for 2 years.

In the last two decades in my county, whenever a board or commission was being formed, Bonnie Johns came to mind as a person who would be sure to meet any task with intelligence and integrity. She gave of her time and talents generously, and the lives of thousands of children in our county are the better for it.

I remember Bonnie Johns fondly as a friend and with great admiration as a public servant. I know we were blessed in Prince George's County during some difficult years to have a leader of Bonnie Johns' wisdom.

I ask the Members of the House to join me in extending our condolences to Bonnie Johns' husband Anthony and to their children and grandchildren.

REMARKS ON BASE CLOSING REPORT

HON. TERRY L. BRUCE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, on February 22, 1989, I testified before the House Armed Services Subcommittee on Military Installations where I expressed my concern about the base closure Commission's report.

Closing and realigning obsolete military bases was one of the cost-saving recommendations of the Grace Commission and an initiative proposed by the congressional Grace caucus, of which I am a cochair.

The act's primary intention was honorable: To save the taxpayers billions of dollars and to make better use of our Nation's defense resources.

I voted against the authorization of the Commission under the act. I agreed with the bill's cost-saving intentions but I believed that its mandate was too narrow and the time frame to evaluate the bases was too short.

More importantly, I was concerned about the sweeping delegation of legislative authority to an outside agency without allowing full congressional oversight.

The enactment of the bill left too great a margin for error. What if national defense were weakened by proposed closures? What if no significant cost savings were achieved? What if mistakes had been made by the Commission? How are these mistakes to be corrected?

Since the release of the base closure report, it is my observation that mistakes have been made by the Commission. Doubts linger in my mind over the legislation's intended savings estimated at $2 to $5 billion a year, and the Commission's proposal which projected a modest savings of $700 million. The Commission seemed to cast aside its mandate of cost reduction, which was the foundation of its charter.

But the Commission's report contains many more serious flaws, specifically with regard to Chanute. I recently toured Chanute Air Force Base in eastern Illinois with Congressman ED MADIGAN. The Commission's report seriously underestimated the facilities at Chanute, the cost of closing the base, and the impact on the surrounding community. The Commission relied on outdated information about the base; and it did not even bother with an onsite inspection.

Since 1981, Congress has appropriated about $150 million for training facilities, permanent buildings, housing, and other support activities. The quality of work in Rantoul and the improvement in Chanute's facilities in recent years, has made the base an essential component of our national security program.

The Commission claims that Chanute was slated for closure "primarily due to reduced mission effectiveness caused by lower quality and limited availability of facilities." In reality, major modern facilities exist throughout the base including a new liquid fuels training facility, $1.9 million; a new weather training facility, $7.5 million; an addition to the aircraft engine training facility, $1.7 million; a new 500-man dormitory, $10.8 million; new steam lines, $16.9 million; a new regional waste water treatment facility, $11.9 million; a new unaccompanied office personnel housing facility, $4.6 million; and a new cold storage facility, $2.9 million. All construction on these projects occured within the last 6 years, with a price-tag of over $66 million. This construction would have to be duplicated at the receiving bases should Chanute be closed. At the receiving bases, there is already a 2-year wait for housing. I don't have to tell you that there is not much incentive for servicemen to reenlist without adequate housing.

As you can see, although Chanute's location represents the Air Force's oldest technical training center, only its location is old—its facilities are new or renovated.

The Commission's contention that Chanute lacks space for administration and training purposes is ludicrous. The base's largest facility, Whitehall, is only surpassed in administrative space by one building in the Department of Defense: The Pentagon. And there is no shortage of buildings for training.

I am concerned about the loss of surge capability should Chanute be closed. Each base has an unused capacity in the case that a mobilization should occur. By closing one of the Air Force's technical training centers, the amount of surge that a base can accommodate would be severely limited.

Fifty-one training courses are offered at Chanute, and none are offered at any other technical training center. Chanute's weather training school teaches weather forecasting to all four branches of the armed services and the Coast Guard. The fire training school instructs all Air Force and Army firefighters. The fuels training school offers courses to test and evaluate aircraft fuels, and safety courses. Everything would have to be redone: Classrooms, equipment, facilities. They all must be placed somewhere since Chanute functions are vital to our defense.

There is great confusion on how the projected cost savings will be achieved. Neither the report nor the working papers confirm or deny a cost savings as a result of the proposed closure. The Commission estimates that the closure of Chanute will save $68.7 million annually. But this figure seems to mirror the cost of operating expenses at the Air Force base each year.

The figure must be based on some other savings since we know that Chanute's functions will be realigned to other facilities; and, according to the Air Force, the realignment of Chanute's functions would require $243 million in construction at the four receiving bases. Others have placed estimates much higher.

We do not know whether they considered all possible costs including: Realignment of functions to the receiving bases; termination of existing contracts with the private sector; cleanup of hazardous wastes; cost of home buyout; legal suits against the Government for damages; large lump sum payments to laid-off tenured teachers in the school district; and defaulted loans and other financial damages caused by the closure.

It is my belief that closing Chanute Air Force Base and realigning its functions elsewhere will actually end up costing the taxpayers money. And we will be compromising our national defense readiness in the process.

As a Member of Congress, it is my obligation to act responsibly in reviewing the Commission's report. The documentation requested from the Commission is absolutely necessary for Congress to make a fair judgment on the base closing recommendations.

A GAO study is now underway which will either confirm the Commission's findings or disapprove them by offering information the Commission had overlooked in its efforts. I urge my colleagues to remain patient until all the facts are in on this matter.

CHILD CARE

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation making child care more widely available to families of all incomes. My legislation makes the current dependent care tax credit refundable and provides incentives to businesses to provide onsite child care facilities for their employees.

The lack of affordable and quality child care is the greatest obstacle confronting women today as they balance their careers, economic livelihoods, and their family's needs. In 1986, some 60 percent of the mothers of 3- to-5-year-olds were working, most because of economic necessity. And the problem is not diminishing. Three-fourths of all school age children and two-thirds of all preschool children will have mothers in the work force by 1995. And a significant number of these children will be in self-care or in the care of other children if this problem is not addressed.

The legislation I am reintroducing would make the dependent-care tax credit refundable. As many of my colleagues are aware, our Tax Code provides for a tax credit for costs associated with dependent care for only those individuals or families who can apply that credit against an existing tax liability. For the 6 million children in poverty, and the 6 million households eliminated from the Federal tax rolls by the 1986 Tax Reform Act, the tax credit is virtually useless. Thus, while the maximum credit in theory is $720 for one child and $1,440 for two or more children, in reality no one can currently claim those amounts since they are higher than the maximum tax liability for the applicable income levels. By making the dependent-care tax credit refundable, families of all income levels will be able to take equal advantage of the tax credit.

A second feature of my bill addresses the day care supply problem by providing incentives to businesses to provide dependent care facilities as a business or as a benefit for their employees. Currently, there is no special tax incentives which would make it more attractive for employers to spend money on day care for its employees than to provide some other kind of fringe benefit. By bill grants a 10-percent tax credit for any investment now eligible for the normal investment tax credit and used for a dependent care facility. I would also establish a new 5-percent investment tax credit for any structural expenses associated with building a dependent care facility, now not eligible for credits of any type.

Mr. Speaker, there have been many child care bills introduced thus far in this Congress, including ones that take advantage of the dependent-care tax credit. Unlike many of those, my legislation does not expand the scope of the Tax Code, but only addresses those families who are already entitled to the dependent-care tax credit. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support my initiative.

I request that the full text of my bill be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

H.R. 1282

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. REFUNDABLE CREDIT FOR EXPENSES FOR HOUSEHOLD AND DEPENDENT CARE SERVICES NECESSARY FOR GAINFUL EMPLOYMENT.

(a) SECTION MOVED TO APPROPRIATE PLACE IN SUBPART C OF PART III OF SUBCHAPTER A OF CHAPTER 1 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1986.—

(1) DESIGNATION.—Section 21 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is henceforth to be designated as section 34A of such Code.

(2) PLACED IN SUBPART C.—The section for which paragraph (1) provides a new section number is hereby moved to the appropriate place in subpart C of part III of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code.

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Paragraph (1) of section 129(e) of such Code (relating to definition of dependent care assistance) is amended by striking out "section 21(b)(2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 34A(b)(2)".

(2) Subsection (e) of section 213 of such Code (relating to exclusion of amounts allowed for care of certain dependents) is amended by striking out "21" and inserting in lieu thereof "34A".

(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENTS.—

(1) The table of sections for subpart A of part III of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by striking out the first item.

(2) The table of sections for subpart C of part III of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 34 the following new item:

"Sec. 34A. Expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1989.

SEC. 2. ADDITIONAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT FOR DEPENDENT CARE CENTER PROPERTY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 46 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to amount of credit for investment in certain depreciable property) is amended—

(1) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) in the case of dependent care center property, the dependent care percentage.",

(2) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2), and

(3) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and".

(b) DEPENDENT CARE PERCENTAGE.—Subsection (b) of section 46 of such Code (relating to determination of percentages) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) DEPENDENT CARE PERCENTAGE.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The dependent care percentage is—

"(i) 10 percent, in the case of dependent care center property not described in clause (ii), or

"(ii) 5 percent, in the case of dependent care center property which (but for section 48(s)(1)) would not be section 38 property.

"(B) REGULAR PERCENTAGE NOT TO APPLY TO PROPERTY NOT OTHERWISE SECTION 38 PROPERTY.—The regular percentage shall not to apply to any dependent care center property to which subparagraph (A)(ii) applies."

(c) DEPENDENT CARE CENTER PROPERTY DEFINED.—Section 48 of such Code (relating to definitions; special rules) is amended by redesignating subsection (t) as subsection (u) and by inserting after subsection (s) the following new subsection:

"(t) DEPENDENT CARE CENTER PROPERTY.—For purposes of this subpart—

"(1) TREATMENT AS SECTION 38 PROPERTY.—For the period beginning after December 31, 1989, dependent care center property shall be treated as meeting the requirements of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) (other than the penultimate sentence of such paragraph).

"(2) DEPENDENT CARE CENTER PROPERTY DEFINED.—The term 'dependent care center property' means property for use by a dependent care center if—

"(A) such center meets the requirements of subparagraphs (C) and (D) of section 34A(b)(2), and

"(B) more than 90 percent of the gross revenue of such center is from 1 or more of the following sources:

"(i) Payments which are employment-related expenses (within the meaning of section 34A(b)(2)) for the care of qualifying individual (within the meaning of section 34A(b)(1)) outside the taxpayer's household.

"(ii) Amounts paid or incurred by an employer which are excludable from the gross income of an employee under section 129 (relating to dependent care assistance programs).

"(iii) Grants received from a State or political subdivision thereof, the District of Columbia, or an organization described in section 501(c) which is exempt from tax under section 501(a)."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall apply to the period after December 31, 1989 (under rules similar to the rules of section 48(m) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986) in taxable years ending after such date.

MICHAEL GIPSON AND ERNEST RODRIGUEZ HONORED AS YOUNG SCHOLAR-ATHLETES

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today I ask that my colleagues join with me in paying tribute to the outstanding young scholar-athletes who are about to be honored by the Sacramento Valley Chapter of the National Football Foundation and Hall of Fame at the organization's annual awards banquet.

Each year, the chapter honors outstanding high school and college scholar-athletes. Each recipient must have maintained a minimum grade point average of 3.2, and exhibit outstanding academic application and performance on and off the football field. Superior school leadership and good citizenship are also requisites.

This year's event will also honor high school students Michael Morris Gipson (Hirm Johnson) and Ernest Rodriguez (Live Oak). Each of these boys played football against overwhelming odds: Michael lost a leg to cancer at the age of 4, while Ernie suffered a similar loss following an accident. Michael and Ernie will receive the Gene Sosnick Award for their courage and determination.

Other high school scholar-athletes to be honored include: Robert Blair (Davis), Chris Campbell (Jesuit), David DeMarco (Woodland), Mark Eddy (Delta), Greg Harcos (Jesuit), Jason Hartsfield (San Juan), Kris Johnson (Bear River), Khari Jones (Center), Mike McCarn (Lincoln), Woon Park (Fairfield), Mark Parsons (Bella Vista), Robert Perry (Bella Vista), Greg Quilici (Jesuit), Bryon Rockwell (Davis), Laurence Taylor (Rio Americano), and Allen Woods (Rio Americano).

Three college scholar-athletes were similarly honored: Mark Krieger (University of California, Davis), Rick Pembrook (University of the Pacific), and Ken Stinnett (California State University, Sacramento).

Congratulations to this year's recipients for exemplary performance, and also to the Sacramento Valley Chapter for undertaking this program to promote and encourage sportsmanship and excellence.

LANCE A MISSILE: LANCE A CHIP

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, during Secretary of State Baker's recent visit to all NATO capitals, the Lance modernization issue dominated the news. Naysayers portrayed West German Chancellor Kohl's announcement on the eve of the visit to postpone the decision on replacing the aging, short-range Lance missile as a major setback for the new Bush administration.

The Lance missile is scheduled to be replaced by 1995 when it nears the end of its useful life. NATO has yet to agree upon a successor missile, which under the terms of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Agreement could have a range up to 300 miles. It had been expected that the Allies would reach agreement on the Lance follow-on sometime this spring. Now Chancellor Kohl wants to delay the decision until after the West German national elections in 1990.

This Member does not believe Chancellor Kohl's request for a postponement of the Lance decision represents the death knell for the missile or NATO unity as some have said. Rather there is a bipartisan group of Members who believe that early development funding of the Lance follow-on is essential in the context of the ongoing Montebello process to modernize and restructure NATO's nuclear forces in Europe. Moreover, modernization of NATO's European forces serves to keep the pressure on the Warsaw Pact as the conventional stability talks are just getting underway.

In this Member's view, agreement by our European Allies, including West Germany, to produce and deploy the Lance follow-on is not necessary this year in order to receive congressional funding for a successor missile. In fact, it would be foolish to foreclose our options prematurely by requiring that kind of European assurance at this time.

The February 23 New York Times made this same point in a thoughtful editorial, "Lance as Missile, Lance as Chip." My only disagreement with the Times' editorial is its suggestion to include short-range nuclear missiles like the Lance in the conventional stability talks. I believe that adding this category of missiles to the agenda would unnecessarily complicate the talks and would undermine the current NATO consensus on this issue. Having noted that exception, I urge my colleagues to read this excellent editorial and support continued funding of the Lance follow-on.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 23, 1989]

LANCE AS MISSILE, LANCE AS CHIP

Secretary of State Baker has returned from his tour of NATO capitals having learned how hard it is to hold a nuclear umbrella over Europe when many Europeans fear the risks and some doubt the need.

Even before Mr. Baker left Washington, Chancellor Helmut Kohl of West Germany announced he would postpone deciding whether to accept new short-range American missiles on German soil. That imposes on Mr. Baker a diplomatic task of exceptional complexity: to help Mr. Kohl accept modernized nuclear missiles while responding to Mikhail Gorbachev's highly successful anti-nuclear peace offensive.

The Bush Administration has developed half an answer. It has decided to begin production of the new Lance missiles so they'll be ready for deployment at an appropriate time. Now the Administration has to produce the other half—a viable arms control proposal.

Even success throws NATO into crisis. The recent Euromissile treaty, which bans intermediate range nuclear rockets, will leave the nuclear defense of Europe much more dependent on short-range weapons like nuclear artillery shells and the 80-mile Lance missile. Since these weapons would explode mostly on German soil, West Germans regard them with limited enthusiasm.

To resist the German anti-nuclear tide and maintain the principle of nuclear deterrence, the Pentagon plans to replace existing Lance missiles, which are expected to be obsolete by 1995, with new Lances with a 280-mile range. This is just under the limit set by the Euromissile treaty.

It was anticipated that Mr. Kohl would accede to deployment of the new missiles. But Mikhail Gorbachev's peace offensives make many West Germans want to wait. Mr. Kohl, facing elections in 1990 and under attack from both left and extreme right, put off the decision until 1991.

Providing that Congress is willing to build the new missiles without a formal acceptance from West Germany, Mr. Kohl's desire to postpone a decision on deployment won't hurt. The new weapons could still be available for deployment by 1995.

But NATO has to anticipate opposition to deployment even after the next West German election. The way to deal with that opposition is to tie deployments to arms control, as was done during negotiations on Euromissiles. In this case, short-range nuclear weapons—not now under negotiation—could be added to the agenda of the Conventional Stability Talks to begin in Vienna March 10.

Germans who seek unilateral disarmament can plausibly be urged not to scrap a bargaining chip under active negotiation. Meanwhile, brisk production of the new missiles would give Moscow an incentive for agreement before they are deployed.

The Warsaw Pact has about 1,400 short-range launchers, compared with NATO's 88 Lance missile launchers. It would be useful to remove this disparity—but not as long as the East maintains its advantages in conventional weapons.

Mr. Gorbachev has already told the United Nations he would reduce his vast tank armies in Europe. Will he now agree to accept equality of conventional and nuclear forces at much lower levels? The best way to find out is to produce the new Lance missiles, and negotiate.

TRIBUTE TO DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, in commemoration of one of our Nation's most inspiring civil rights leaders, I would like to submit written testimony in honor of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., prepared by Mr. Daniel A. Young, Sr., a constituent in my district.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., though tired and weary afoot from his travels, heavy burdened with his caring for the plight of the poor, the needs of the homeless, concern for the unemployed, were he here among us today he would say, "The road for equality stretches before me, I haven't got time to sleep."

Dr. King's registration campaign through Selma is over, the march on the Nation's Capitol for jobs and freedom has ended, but the winding road for equality continues and looms ahead—still full of pot holes, still in need of constant repair.

Yes, Mr. King sleeps, but we can make his dream a reality by maintaining the constant vigil for equality and civil rights, in our schools, in our jobs, for the ill among us and in our concern for the homeless.

As conscientious Americans, black or white, rich or poor, we can no longer accept the placement of detours and road blocks in the road for equality and civil rights.

Yes, we can keep the dream he dreamed alive by making his vision for equality our very own.

When we help to educate, when we extend a hand or offer a word of kindness or give the opportunity to try, we continue to honor the name and memory of the late Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

A TRIBUTE TO W. STANLEY MACHEN

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, last month, on January 3, Prince Georges County lost one of its most civically active citizens, and one of our best Democrats, with the death of Stanley Machen.

He was not only a lifelong Democrat, but a lifelong Prince Georgian. Born in Hyattsville, Stanley Machen served our country in the Navy in World War II. He graduated from George Washington University, and began his business in 1946.

Mr. Machen was a successful businessman, having operated his own engineering and surveying firm for four decades. In addition to his political activities, he participated in many business organizations, including the Prince Georges Kiwanis Club and the Chamber of Commerce. He also was a member of the Prince Georges and Montgomery County Engineering Society.

For more than 25 years I have been involved in politics, I knew Stanley Machen as the guiding force behind the Young Men's Democratic Club, one of the most active organizations of its kind in our county. He had served as its president, and on his death was treasurer of the club.

The Machens are a politically active family. Some of you were colleagues of Stanley Machen's brother, former Congressman Hervey Machen, when he served in this House in the 1960's.

As we all know, those of us who hold public office owe a lot to the people behind the scenes who give of their time and ability to make our political parties great. In Prince Georges County we have always had a debt to a true "Mr. Democrat," Stanley Machen. We will all miss him greatly.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in expressing our continued sympathy and condolences to Stanley Machen's family; his wife, Pauline, his brother Hervey, and his sister, Mrs. Theo Patterson.

INTRODUCTION OF ILLEGAL DUMPING PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reintroduce the Illegal Dumping Prevention Act of 1989. This legislation would give the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] and the U.S. Attorney General the power to seize boats and other vessels of waste transporters found guilty of illegally dumping medical waste, hazardous waste, and municipal solid waste into the oceans and waterways in violation of EPA permits.

As you may recall, at the end of the 100th Congress, legislation was passed and signed into law that bans the future dumping of sewage sludge. It also sets together penalties for those caught dumping medical waste. However, the Illegal Dumping Prevention Act gives the agencies that enforce the ocean dumping laws the additional muscle they need to effectively stop the illegal dumping of not only medical waste, but also hazardous waste and municipal solid waste. The Illegal Dumping Prevention Act of 1989 will offer an additional sentencing option providing a strong incentive for waste disposers to comply with the laws that are currently on the books. Dumpers will know in advance that when they illegally dump any waste, they will lose their boats.

The issue of illegal dumping caught the public's attention last summer because many beaches were forced to be closed, and swimmers were fewer because of the waste washing up on shore. However, illegal dumping has broader economic and environmental effects that go far beyond just closed beaches.

As many may remember, from November 1987 through January 1988, more than 21 dead whales washed up on our shores. Many of the pollutants being dumped into the oceans are being eaten by fish, dolphins, and seals. In addition, the dumped waste adds nutrients to the water, overloading the ecosystem and exacerbating existing environmental problems like the low oxygen levels that we have seen in the Long Island Sound in the summers.

Because of these problems, our fishermen who depend on oceans and waterways for their livelihood have been experiencing smaller catches and catching fish with fin rot and other diseases that make them unmarketable. Many areas which were once breeding grounds for oysters and other shellfish are no longer fishable because the catch is contaminated, dead, or simply too small to be worth harvesting.

Though vessels would be seized only from those convicted in court of illegally dumping, this bill sends a strong message to illegal dumpers that their actions will no longer be tolerated. The Illegal Dumping Prevention Act of 1989 provides a tough sentencing option to use against those who profit from polluting our oceans. It makes it clear that we are serious about protecting our oceans and beaches for our children, grandchildren, and even for our use today.

It is time that polluters stop using our oceans and waterways as sewers. Illegal dumping in the oceans threatens a vital economic and environmental resource on which our entire Nation depends. I urge my colleagues to join me in sending a strong message to potential dumpers that we are serious about protecting our oceans and waterways.

AN ADDITIONAL OBSERVANCE OF ST. PATRICK'S DAY AS IT RELATES TO THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share an account of U.S. history, regarding the Revolutionary War. The story of this event bears particular coincidence to our traditional recognition of St. Patrick's Day. This rendition was researched and written by Kevin Doherty, Amanda Gorman, India Henshaw, and Pierre Royer, from Mr. Paul Gibbons, fifth grade class at the Charles H. Taylor Elementary School, in Boston. As a former graduate of the Taylor School, I am proud to to share this historical event as it was prepared by these students.

A MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL EVENT

An important event during the Revolutionary War was the evacuation of the British Army from Boston.

Here's how it happened: Fort Ticonderoga is located on Lake Champlain in New York State. It was an important stronghold during the Revolutionary War. When the hostilities began the Province of Connecticut ordered Ethan Allen to seize the fort, taking it from the British generals. On May tenth, 1775, Ethan Allen and Benedict Arnold led "The Green Mountain Boys" (of Vermont) in a surprise attack. Ethan Allen yelled "come on out you rat" to the commanding officer. Getting the weapons to Boston was a herculean task. General Henry Knox was made the leader by George Washington. Washington greeted him for this auspicious honor, and jokingly asked, "But where are the weapons?"

It was agreed that Washington had an appalling lack of weapons. Whereupon the resourceful Gen. Knox made an inquiry into the hauling of British cannons (captured earlier by Ethan Allen at Fort Ticonderoga in New York) to the capital city of Boston. Washington fell in with this ingenious idea. Henry Knox and his brother William set out after the desperately needed equipment.

The time was mid-November 1775. Knox estimated the 300 mile trip would take two or three weeks. But Knox did not bargain for blinding snowstorms, freezing gales and hampering thaws that plagued his men, his boats, horses and sleighs. The group did not reach their destination until late January, 1776.

Knox brought the cannons across Massachusetts and around to the southern part of the city right near our school. Then, the Americans were ready to attack the British ships in the harbor. The British General saw his ships could be attacked by the cannons on Dorchester Heights and decided to leave Boston harbor.

This day is celebrated on March 17th as Evacuation Day. The password that day, General Knox said, was "St. Patrick." The day the British left was March 17, now St. Patrick's Day, so Boston celebrates two events that day.

With the departure of the British, Boston ceased to be a battleground.

Her sons of Liberty took a glorious part in the fighting in other places, but the town itself was not again in the conflict.

VA SUPPLEMENTAL AN URGENT MATTER

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, when President Bush spoke to the Veterans of Foreign Wars yesterday morning, he told them he was aware of funding problems in veterans health care and he promised to work with the Congress in solving the problems.

Many of my colleagues and veterans from across the country have contacted me in recent weeks concerning the dire funding situation now faced by all of our veterans' hospitals.

Hospital beds are being closed; programs and services are being terminated; positions for health care professionals remain unfilled; equipment and maintenance money is being diverted to pay salaries; in many instances, prescriptions are not being filled; and scores of low-income veterans are being denied medical treatment. The problem is lack of money.

This is the most serious situation VA hospitals have encountered in many years.

As you are probably aware, both the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Secretary-designate of the Department of Veterans Affairs have requested emergency supplemental funding for the VA this fiscal year. We have also requested reasonable increases over administration proposals for VA spending in fiscal year 1990.

As a result of this funding crisis, Richard Darman, Director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, agreed to meet with me and other members of the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees as well as members of the Appropriations Committee.

We had a very constructive meeting with Mr. Darman last Wednesday during which we explained to him the severity of the VA medical funding shortfall. Though he made no firm commitment on the level of funding that will be required to get through this fiscal year, Mr. Darman recognizes that something must be done.

At the conclusion of this meeting, Mr. Darman expressed his desire to work closely with the Congress to resolve this matter. He expects to send the President a recommendation regarding a supplemental later this week.

I want to applaud Mr. Darman's willingness to work with us on this funding problem.

I also want to thank my good friend from Michigan, BOB TRAXLER, the new chairman of the VA/HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee. The gentleman has seen firsthand the hardships this funding crisis is causing in our veterans' hospitals and is very involved in helping us find the proper solutions. The first hearing he held upon assuming the leadership of the subcommittee was on the VA medical care supplemental. He is a strong veterans' advocate, and he will work to send a bill to the floor without delay. I applaud the efforts of the distinguished chairman from Michigan.

Mr. Speaker, the VA needs supplemental funding now. I urge my colleagues to throw their full support behind this effort.

HONORING PLANNED PARENTHOOD ASSOCIATION OF BUCKS COUNTY, PA

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, 1989 is a major anniversary year for an important organization in my congressional district, the Planned Parenthood Association of Bucks County [PPABC].

For 25 years, PPABC has worked energetically and effectively to achieve its goal: "Every child a wanted child." PPABC has earned its reputation as a leader in the health and human services field in southeastern Pennsylvania. The agency has consistently received superior commendation for its delivery of the highest quality medical family planning services, for its expertise in sexuality education for all ages, and for its effective advocacy of family planning services and reproductive freedom for Pennsylvanians.

PPABC has distinguished itself not only by the duration, by also by the scope and quality of its services. The organization, frequently in coalition with other groups, has provided able leadership and positive direction in dealing with some of the critical health, educational, and advocacy concerns of our time, concerns that have a profound effect on individuals and the community as a whole. The accomplishments of the agency, in addition to serving over 10,000 contraceptive patients annually, include establishing a community task force and a comprehensive program to prevent teenage pregnancy, initiating a community AIDS network and promoting and providing AIDS education, expanding medical service to offer important health screening tests to low-income seniors, helping parents and children to communicate about sexuality, and working with teachers, counselors, mental health professionals, agency personnel, and the clergy to help them to be more effective in assisting others with sexuality concerns.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Bertha Bates Cole, Elise F. Jones, Dr. Herbert K. Speers, Samuel Snipes, John C. Haas, and Charles Meredith, all of whom played a significant role in the early years—when birth control was not considered an appropriate topic for public debate in many communities—and who remain staunch supporters of Planned Parenthood to this day.

Over the past 25 years many Bucks Countians have served unselfishly as president of this fine organization: Elise F. Jones, Gordon Wallace, Mary Bull, Lucy Leigh, Rev. George E. Hollingshead, Jr., Zayde E. McLean, Francine Harbert, C.E. Denoon, Jr., Alice Bentley, Nancy Morrill, Laura Jackson, and Penny Wood.

The Planned Parenthood Auxiliary, founded in 1977, deserves special mention for its important support, thanks to presidents Mary Bierman, Mary Bull, Vickie Fischer, Bertha Conyne, Mary Ann Hemingway, and Monica Cook.

Finally, I want to congratulate Ruth Laibstain, executive director, who for more than 20 years has guided the agency forward, often in the face of adversity. She works with a fine staff who share her dedication: Margaret Fuller, Charlotte Dorko, and Ellen Raphael, nurse practitioners; Hazel Miles, LPN, operations manager; Sally McCormick, director of education; Sandra Storch, RN, director of patient services; Maggie Groff, director of public affairs; Joyce Pfeiffer, social services coordinator Phyllis Morabito, counselor; and Sylvia Cucchiaro, office manager.

Special thanks also to Joan Stack, chair of the 25th Anniversary Committee, and the entire committee for organizing a year of celebration. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in wishing Planned Parenthood of Bucks County another successful 25 years.

FAIRNESS FOR ADOPTING FAMILIES ACT

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for several Congresses I have introduced legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide a deduction for adoption expenses. I recently introduced H.R. 1205, the "Fairness for Adopting Families Act" along with my colleagues Congressman CHARLES RANGEL, Congresswoman PATRICIA SCHROEDER, and Congressman FRANK WOLF. A companion bill in the Senate, S. 479, has been introduced by Senators ORRIN HATCH and PAUL SIMON as well.

I believe that we should refocus our priorities and take a special interest in representing our Nation's children with emphasis on their needs and rights. One change in this direction was signaled by President Bush's announcement during his State of the Union Address. He promised to take steps to create a tax deduction for adoption expenses. I have worked for a bipartisan approach to this issue in the past, and I welcome working with the Bush administration on this important issue.

We neglectfully forget that there are many children who do not live in permanent homes with loving, nurturing parents. Just as each child has a right to a home, I believe that people who are eager to become parents should not be barred only because they cannot afford the high costs associated with adoption. For those who chose this option, and it is a magnificent way to form families, we should better address today's needs and heecessary obstacles that prevent successful adoption in this country.

We have not done very much to encourage the development of healthy families, despite a lot of lip service to this ideal. Children still languish in the foster care system much too long, their best interests being lost in legal mire. Many prospective parents are ready and able to parent older, hard-to-place, and handicapped children as well as infants.

When enacted, this legislation will alleviate much suffering by American taxpayers who desperately want to parent but simply do not have the savings or income necessary to meet the increasing costs of adoption. Let us help children and would-be parents by allowing a little relief that is already being allowed to taxpayers that are covered by medical insurance and are allowed a tax deduction for childbirth expenses. It would also help families who are, more and more, choosing to expand their own families through adoption.

Tax reform enacted during 1986 has abandoned the needs of children and prospective adoptive parents by leaving this issue to the States. Yet research has shown most States have neither the funds nor sufficient interest to initiate adoption assistance programs.

The legislation being introduced in the House today would provide a tax deduction for reasonable and necessary adoption of a child by a taxpayer. These fees include agency fees, court costs, attorney fees, and other expenses directly related to the legal adoption of a child. It does not allow expenses incurred in the adoption by an individual of the spouse's child since such a child would already be a member of a family. The amount allowable shall not exceed $5,000 and in the case of an international adoption, $7,000. The deduction would not be allowed for anyone whose taxable income exceeds $60,000. And to encourage more companies to join those who already provide employee reimbursement for adoption expenses, the bill allows for business expenses.

One of the primary barriers to adoption for the mainstream of American citizens who wish to adopt is the cost associated with adoption. I know from the many letters I have received over the years and from my long involvement in adoption issues that the expenses prohibit many deserving people from adopting infants or older children. It is a myth that those who adopt can afford to do so. And it is unfair for only those who can afford to adopt to become parents. It is unfair to the children who I believe have a right to be nurtured in loving homes. And it is short-sighted if we do not help prospective adoptive parents to realize their dream.

Our children are our future, and we have a responsibility as legislators to represent their needs. It is time for adoption as a mode of family formation to receive more support, and I urge my colleagues to consponsor this legislation and work for its early passage.

The text of the "Fairness for Adopting Families Act" follows:

H.R. 1205

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Fairness for Adopting Families Act".

SEC. 2. DEDUCTION FOR ADOPTION EXPENSES.

(a) DEDUCTION FOR ADOPTION EXPENSES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by redesignating section 221 as section 222 and by inserting after section 220 the following new section:

"SEC. 221. ADOPTION EXPENSES.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction for the taxable year the amount of the qualified adoption expenses paid or incurred by the taxpayer during such taxable year.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) DOLLAR LIMITATION.—The amount allowable as a deduction under subsection (a) with respect to the legal adoption of any child by the taxpayer shall not exceed $5,000 ($7,000 in the case of an international adoption).

"(2) INCOME LIMITATION.—The amount allowable as a deduction under subsection (a) for any taxable year shall be reduced (but not below zero) by an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount so allowable (determined without regard to this paragraph but with regard to paragraph (1)) as—

"(A) the amount (if any) by which the taxpayer's adjusted gross income (determined without regard to this section and section 136) exceeds $60,000, bears to

"(B) $10,000.

"(3) DENIAL OF DOUBLE BENEFIT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—No deduction shall be allowed under subsection (a) for any expense for which a deduction or credit is allowable under any other provision of this chapter.

"(B) GRANTS.—No deduction shall be allowed under subsection (a) for any expenses paid from any funds received under any Federal, State, or local program.

"(c) QUALIFIED ADOPTION EXPENSES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified adoption expenses' means reasonable and necessary adoption fees (including agency fees), court costs, attorney fees, and other expenses which—

"(A) are directly related to the legal adoption of a child by the taxpayer but only if such adoption has been arranged—

"(i) by a State or local agency with responsibility under State or local law for child placement through adoption.

"(ii) by a non-profit, voluntary adoption agency which is authorized by State or local law to place children for adoption, or

"(iii) through a private placement, and

"(B) are not incurred in violation of State or Federal law.

"(2) ADOPTION EXPENSES NOT TO INCLUDE CERTAIN AMOUNTS.—The term 'qualified adoption expenses' shall not include any expenses in connection with—

"(A) the adoption by an individual of a child who is the child of such individual's spouse, or

"(B) travel outside the United States, unless such travel is required—

"(i) as a condition of a legal adoption by the country of the child's origin,

"(ii) to assess the health and status of the child to be adopted, or

"(iii) to escort the child to be adopted to the United States.

"(3) CHILD.—The term 'child' shall include any child determined by the State to be a child described in paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 473(c) of the Social Security Act."

(2) 2 PERCENT FLOOR NOT TO APPLY.—Subsection (b) of section 67 of such Code (relating to 2-percent floor on miscellaneous itemized deductions) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (12), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (13) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and", and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(14) the deduction under section 221 (relating to adoption expenses)."

(3) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for such part VII is amended by striking out the last item and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 221. Adoption expenses.

"Sec. 222. Cross reference."

(b) ADOPTION ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Part III of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code (relating to items specifically excluded from gross income) is amended by redesignating section 136 as section 137 and by inserting after section 135 the following new section:

"SEC. 136. ADOPTION ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Gross income of an employee does not include amounts paid or expenses incurred by the employer for qualified adoption expenses in connection with the adoption of a child by an employee if such amounts are furnished pursuant to an adoption assistance program.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) DOLLAR LIMITATION.—The amount excludable from gross income under subsection (a) with respect to the legal adoption of any child by the taxpayer shall not exceed the excess (of any) of $5,000 ($7,000 in the case of an international adoption) over the amount allowable as a deduction under section 220 with respect to such adoption.

"(2) INCOME LIMITATION.—The amount excludable from gross income under subsection (a) for any taxable year shall be reduced (but not below zero) by an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount so excludable (determined without regard to this paragraph but with regard to paragraph (1)) as—

"(A) the amount (if any) by which the taxpayer's adjusted gross income (determined without regard to this section) exceeds $60,000, bears to

"(B) $10,000.

"(c) ADOPTION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM.—For purposes of this section, an adoption assistance program is a plan of an employer—

"(1) under which the employer provides employees with adoption assistance, and

"(2) which meets—

"(A) the requirements of section 89(k), and

"(B) requirements similar to the requirements of paragraphs (2), (3), and (5) of section 127(b).

"(d) QUALIFIED ADOPTION EXPENSES.—For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified adoption expenses' has the meaning given such term by section 221(c)."

(2) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Paragraph (2) of section 89(i) of such Code (defining statutory employee benefit plan) is amended by inserting after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) An adoption assistance program (within the meaning of section 136(c))."

(3) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part III of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by striking out the last item and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 136. Adoption assistance programs.

"Sec. 137. Cross reference to other Acts."

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1988.

CORRECTION OF RECORD

HON. LYNN MARTIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, February 28, during House debate on House Resolution 84, creating three select committees, I discussed an amendment I had intended to offer, directing the Rules Committee to report back its recommendations on reconstituting the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control as a permanent committee.

Although I was not permitted under the procedure to offer the amendment, the chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. PEPPER] graciously promised that the Rules Committee would hold a hearing on the matter at an early date and, in his words, "report back to the House * * * with respect to whether or not the Select Committee on Narcotics should be reconstituted as a standing legislative committee of the House." (p. H406)

While I read directly from my amendment during my remarks, the text the reporters of debates placed in the RECORD at page H405 was an earlier version that appeared in the Rules Committee report. For that reason, I am not only correcting the permanent RECORD, but including at this point the text of the amendment to which I was referring. The amendment follows:

AN AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. MARTIN OF ILLINOIS TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 84

In Title III, add the following new section:

"SEC. 307. The Committee on Rules shall report back to the House at the earliest practicable date its recommendations on reconstituting the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control as a permanent, standing committee of the House with legislative authority.".

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, once again, legislation has been introduced this year to recognize a very special group of individuals—our older Americans. I am a proud cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 60, legislation that would designate May 1989 as Older Americans Month.

Older Americans Month is a time when we can look to the valuable contributions that senior citizens make to each of our communities. Older individuals are the fastest growing segment of our population. It is estimated that one out of nine Americans are elderly. As more Americans live longer, I believe we should take special note of their vital contributions to our society and listen to their input. We should learn from the matured wisdom that older Americans possess because that is a valuable resource we cannot afford to ignore.

In the Ninth District of Florida, seniors are particularly aware of Federal, State, and local activities that affect the elderly. Many older Americans have taken an active role in their communities, and thus, continue to make constructive contributions to their fellow citizens. Senior citizens now provide invaluable services to health care organizations, small business development, and child care.

Working with the senior community has been one of my most rewarding jobs as a Federal Representative and I will continue to protect the well-being of our older population. Our seniors are entitled to be recognized for their contributions to our society and I am pleased to be a cosponsor of a bill that will express gratitude for their accomplishments.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO EXTEND FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE CREDIT FOR CERTAIN NATIONAL GUARD TECHNICIANS

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to correct an inequity affecting a small number of former civilian employees of the National Guard.

National Guard technicians are full-time, civilian employees of the Army and Air National Guard. They provide the day-to-day support necessary to make the Guard an effective military reserve force: They maintain the military equipment assigned to the Guard, recruit new members for the Guard, maintain all necessary records, and represent the Guard in the community. These employees perform a vital service to the National Guard and are an important link in the defense capabilities of our Nation.

Twenty years ago, the 90th Congress recognized the importance of the National Guard technicians by enacting the National Guard Technicians Act of 1968. Public Law 90-486 brought this class of employees into the Civil Service Retirement System and clarified their status as Federal employees. Unfortunately, Congress did not grant full credit for prior service, though this was standard practice. They were granted only 55 percent credit for annuity computation purposes. The effective date imposed by the law was January 1, 1969, which denied credit to those technicians who had moved to other Federal employment prior to that date. In many instances, the former National Guard technicians had simply moved to a similar position with the Army or Air Force Reserve.

The 94th Congress became aware of this inequity and took some corrective action, though lack of vital demographic information precluded complete resolution at that time. However, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service did recognize the inequity and House Report No. 94-461 stated:

To the committee's knowledge, no other group of employees brought under the civil service retirement system has been penalized in this manner.

Despite attempts in each intervening Congress, no further action was taken until the 99th Congress. Public Law 99-661 contained a provision granting credit for pre-1969 National Guard technician service to those who were employed under the Civil Service Retirement System at the time of application. It did not extend the same benefit to those former technicians who had previously retired, or separated, from Federal service.

There are about 100 pre-1969 National Guard technicians who had retired from Federal service prior to enactment of Public Law 99-661. Most of these individuals are World War II and Korean conflict veterans: Their average age is 65. They average 6.77 years of civilian service in the National Guard—their service ranges from a few months to as many as 20 years and they were denied the opportunity of applying for retirement credit. There are a few surviving spouses of deceased former National Guard technicians who have been denied benefits as a result of this inequity.

Mr. Speaker, the intent of my bill is to correct this 20-year-old inequity by allowing Federal retirement credit for all prior service as a National Guard technician. It would ensure fair and equal treatment for all those men and women who have served their country as technicians in the National Guard and guarantee them retirement compensation for work they have performed for the Government and that has been paid for entirely by Federal funds.

The bill does not provide for the Federal Government to pay back any amount due to recomputation, but applies only to monthly payments accruing after the enactment of this bill. Furthermore, because of the age and financial ability of most of these former National Guard technicians, the requirement of a "pay back" deposit is made optional—this is normal civil service practice.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill to assist these public servants who deserve to receive credit for their work as civilian employees of the National Guard.

VOLUNTEERS OF AMERICA

HON. RICHARD H. BAKER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, the week of March 5-12, 1989, is recognized as Volunteers of America Week. This important national organization has its headquarters in the State of Louisiana.

Throughout its history Volunteers of America has been forming partnerships to meet community needs. These partnerships exist in more than 175 communities across the United States. The cumulative success of this organization is surpassed only by the differences made in millions of individuals' lives.

Volunteers of America is recognized for cost effective and creative services for those in need. The organization professionalism is surpassed only by the dedication of its volunteers and staff. This dedication has resulted in an outstanding history of nearly a century of services in the true spirit of American philanthropy.

With a unique ability for timely response to human needs, Volunteers of America will continue in a leadership role in solving community problems. New services are being added at a dramatic pace. But more importantly, Volunteers of America is developing new kinds of partnerships that multiply and focus resources on community problems.

Today, there is a need for volunteer organizations to give aid to those who are homeless, unemployed, or otherwise need help. Our society has always relied upon the private sector and volunteer organizations to help the less fortunate. Volunteers of America has been in the forefront of this effort. It is only appropriate that we take this opportunity to recognize the important contributions that Volunteers of America have made to our country during this special week.

Fortunately for all of us, Volunteers of America displays the vision and leadership to be among the thousand points of light that are so important now and that will be so important in the years to come.

MEDAL OF HONOR TO PLATT FAMILY

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to give a Congressional Medal of Honor to the Platt family of Philadelphia, PA. In 1896, Sgt. George Crawford Platt was awarded the Medal of Honor for his heroic feats during the Civil War. George C. Platt is well known in the Philadelphia area for his courage. Indeed, a major bridge in Philadelphia was named after him and is a tribute to his efforts on behalf of the U.S. Cavalry.

Unfortunately, Sergeant Platt's medal was destroyed in a fire at the family's house in 1968. I have tried to work with the U.S. Army to have a new medal issued to the family. However, the Army has informed me that it is against its policy to reissue Medals of Honor unless the original recipient is alive. My legislation would simply give the Platt family a new Medal of Honor free of charge. I know the Platt family would deeply appreciate having a new medal.

THE PASSING OF MR. MILTON MOORE

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to note with sadness the passing of a distinguished citizen of my district, Mr. Milton Moore, national commander of the American Ex-Prisoners of War. Mr. Moore died in El Paso, TX, on March 6, 1989, at the age of 68.

Mr. Moore was a native of East Marion, NY, and joined the Army in 1939. After humble beginnings shoeing mules for the cavalry, he advanced to the rank of captain. He participated in the invasion of Normandy on June 6th, 1944, where he was later taken prisoner by the German forces. Only 23 years old, he spent 9 months in several POW camps in Poland. After a stint in solitary confinement he escaped but was recaptured. Two tries later, in February of 1945, he was successful.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Moore will be remembered for who he was as well as for what he did. He displayed uncommon courage on the battlefield, and, as his three attempts at escape testify, he never in his heart surrendered. He was a loving father and husband. He believed in all the things that make America great, such as love of country, hard work, sacrifice, and dedication. I realize that in this day and age these concepts may seem alien, especially to many of our young people. But I would hope and pray that should our Nation ever face another such test, young Americans would follow the sterling example set by Milton Moore and his generation.

After retiring from the Army in 1966, Mr. Moore served in the El Paso and Texas chapters of the American Ex-Prisoners of War where he served four terms as national director. In October 1988, he was elected national commander of the organization.

Only a week ago, on February 28, 1989, Commander Moore presented the American Ex-Prisoners of War legislative agenda before a joint session of the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees. Commander Moore dedicated much of his time to veterans' issues and was an excellent spokesman for this important cause. He was a key supporter in my efforts to address veterans' issues in my district and it is with great sadness that I record these words. I would like to extend my condolences to his wife Eva, his four children, and to the membership of the American Ex-Prisoners of War.

WELL-DESERVED HONORS FOR ROBERT AND DONNA DEJONGH

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1989

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to ask Congress to take note of two outstanding young architects from the U.S. Virgin Islands, Robert and Donna deJongh, who have earned a prestigious national award for their outstanding work in the field of architecture.

The deJonghs' firm on St. Thomas, DeJongh & Associates, has received the Young Firm Award from the Howard University School of Architecture and Planning, which conducted a nationwide search for outstanding achievement by black architects before giving the top award to the deJonghs. DeJongh & Associates is the very first firm to receive the Young Firm Award, which was recently presented at a ceremony here in Washington marking the 78th anniversary of architectural studies at Howard University. The award recognizes the exceptional quality of the deJonghs' work throughout their 15-year career and is part of the university's effort to honor black architects, whose tradition of excellence has gone unrecognized.

In making the award, Howard University had this to say about the deJonghs' achievements:

During the life of your firm, the quality of your design statements has been sensitive to their vernacular environments. Throughout the range of your commissions, you have maintained an allegiance to a particular Virgin Islands design parti and scale.

DeJongh Associates, the importance of your work in contributing to a historically recognizable architecture for the Virgin Islands is commendable.

I would like to strongly endorse the judgment of the architectural judges in this case. The deJonghs' work is highly creative and sensitive to the tropical environment of the Virgin Islands. Every facet of their work—which is evident in many of our most prominent public buildings, resorts, business establishments, and historic structures—reflects their concern for the historical and cultural heritage of our islands. They have envisioned and designed some of our most successful historical renovations in the islands. In every case, their designs reflect the scale, delicacy, and vivid colors of our tropical environment. They have brought a special vision to their work that, as Howard University says, is helping to establish a distinctive Virgin Islands style of architecture. This reward is most appropriate because it recognizes the quality of their work over their entire career, serving a host of different clients and finding creative solutions to a variety of problems.

Robert and Donna deJongh started their firm in the Virgin Islands in 1974, just 4 years after they graduated from the Howard University School of Architecture and Planning. Their young firm has blossomed from a two-person practice to a humming enterprise that employs 32 people in architectural design, engineering, urban planning, and related fields.

Robert, a graduate of Sts. Peter and Paul High School on St. Thomas, and Donna Criner deJongh, a graduate of Jack Yates Senior High School in Houston, both have given tremendously to their community and their profession. Robert has just finished a term as president of the St. Thomas-St. John Chamber of Commerce and he has served on the St. Thomas-St. John Planning Board. He and Donna have both served as president of the Virgin Islands Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, as well as on national architectural boards that set the standards for their profession.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to add my tribute to Robert and Donna deJongh, who are doing so much to enhance the beauty of the Virgin Islands and encourage all Virgin Islanders to aspire to excellence.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, March 8, 1989

The House met at 2 p.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We pray, O merciful God, that Your glory will transcend all the ordinary concerns that we face and cause us to lift our eyes to the ultimate purposes of life. May not the pressures and problems of each day keep our sights only to that which is close to us, but may Your Spirit give the purpose, direction, and indeed the joy that comes from Your Word of hope and of truth. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN] kindly lead us in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. GLICKMAN led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Haller, one of its clerks, announced that the order entered by the Senate on February 22, with respect to the Senate hearing arguments on and disposing of the motions filed by Judge Alcee L. Hastings to dismiss articles 1 through 15 and article 17 of the articles of impeachment be modified so that proceedings that were scheduled to occur on March 8 and 9 be postponed to occur on Wednesday, March 15 and Thursday, March 16.

The message also announced that pursuant to sections 276d–276g, title 22, of the United States Code, as amended, the Chair on behalf of the Vice President, appoints Mr. CONRAD as chairman of the Senate delegation to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group during the 101st Congress.

DO NOT TREAD ON THE AMERICAN FLAG

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the American flag does not belong on the floor. Despite this very fundamental American belief, it is reported that an art institute in Chicago has chosen to display our grand symbol in this degrading manner.

There have been significant repercussions resulting from this decision, several of which have been prominently reported by the Nation's newspapers and wire services. Veterans of some of our national service organizations have publicly protested the display; approximately 600 people in a Sunday demonstration marched on the institute. It has been reported that an Alexandria, VA, art teacher was arrested on a felony flag desecration charge after she stepped on the flag as it lay spread across the floor. Other news accounts state that an Illinois State senator has vowed to have the museum official in charge of exhibitions arrested on charges of desecrating the American flag. And I'm sure there will be more to come in this controversy.

I believe that the manner in which we treat the American flag reveals much about how we regard ourselves as a free and independent society. In a Supreme Court decision in 1907, Justice Harlan said:

The flag is the symbol of the Nation's power, the emblem of freedom in its truest, best sense. It is not extravagant to say that to all lovers of the country it signifies government resting on the consent of the governed; liberty regulated by law; the protection of the weak against the strong; security against the exercise of arbitrary power; and absolute safety for free institutions against foreign aggression.

In a Flag Day speech, President Woodrow Wilson expressed his sentiments about the American flag as follows:

I know of nothing more difficult than to render an adequate tribute to the emblem of our nation. For those of us who have shared that nation's life and felt the beat of its pulse it must be considered a matter of impossibility to express the great things which that emblem embodies.

Mr. Speaker, the Stars and Stripes is the bloodshed of nine wars and countless conflicts to preserve freedom and democracy. It is the spirit and determination of a society that cares for its people. It is the history of struggle and the record of success. It is power, glory, and honor. It is adversity and peace. It is the grandest sight in a foreign land. It is hope. It is home.

Unfurled on battlefields around the globe, rolling and flapping in the coliseum breeze, draped over the coffins of those who have fought for her honor, and shining in the silent stillness of the Moon, the Stars and Stripes is our belief in ourselves and our dreams of what we can become.

In his historic speech to a joint session of Congress on September 9, 1971, Col. James B. Irwin, one of the Apollo 15 astronauts who landed on the Moon, said:

The proudest moment of my life was when I saluted our American flag that we had planted on the plain at Hadley-Apennine.

Mr. Speaker, today the flag flies over the Nation's Capitol and the U.S. Supreme Court. It flies over all our national cemeteries throughout the world. We affectionately refer to our flag as "Old Glory" and citizens throughout our country desire that it be treated with great respect.

Still, there are those few who have no feelings for our Nation's symbol and we have had to enact a criminal statute to address their shortcomings. On July 5, 1968, President Johnson signed into law a provision that whoever knowingly casts contempt upon any flag of the United States by publicly mutilating, defacing, defiling, burning, or trampling upon it shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

Today, I am introducing a bill that would amend the law by providing that the same penalty be imposed upon anyone who knowingly displays the flag of the United States on the ground or on the floor, as was the case at the aforementioned art display.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is true that freedom of expression is also a basic American principle, but it can and should coexist with a sense of reverence for the flag and all that it means to Americans. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

THE 1990'S, "THE DECADE OF THE BRAIN"

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, while last month we celebrated the birthday of George Washington, the Father of

Our Country, it also marked the birth of a founding father of another sort—160 years ago, Silas Mitchell, the "Founder of Neurology," was born.

If Silas were alive today, he would marvel at our advances in the study, care, and treatment of brain-related disorders. But he would also realize that we have much more to learn, and that the next decade could bring the most amazing improvements yet in the study of the brain.

To recognize and support the advances our scientists are making in the treatment of brain disorders, today I am introducing, with 84 of my colleagues, a resolution to declare the 1990's the "decade of the brain."

I ask all my colleagues to join me in commemorating these advances by cosponsoring my resolution.

The decade of the brain. Think about it.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 1087

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 1087.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

SOME OF THE REAGAN CUTS ARE UNCONSCIONABLE AND OUGHT TO BE CORRECTED

(Mr. BENNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, when I was home in Jacksonville, FL, last weekend, a widow of a Navy officer told me that her allotment from her husband's pension that was set aside in a contract between the Navy and her husband, which allotted her so much money, has now been reduced because she also gets Social Security. This was an attack upon entitlements which she could not understand.

I cannot understand it either.

When I realize the tremendous cuts that were made in taxes at the beginning of the last administration and that we are now catching up that kind of money out of the hides of little people and out of the contracts we have had with people for entitlements, which they have earned under contract, I think it is unconscionable and ought to be corrected.

To selectively impose such financial loss on the retired serviceman who has served his country long and loyally—and on the widows of such retirees—is bureaucracy at its worst, and is plainly unjust.

If there must be sacrifices for budget balancing, then let the burden fall equally across all comparable programs. Our Nation must not selectively penalize those who have given the prime years of their lives to the Nation's defense.

TARGETING THE WASTE IN OUR FEDERAL BUDGET

(Mr. HASTERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HASTERT. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I was invited by the Warrenville, IL, Kiwanis Club to come to their weekly meeting and accept a check for $100—a small amount as budget discussions go on this floor. But the check is for an important cause.

The check is made out to the U.S. Treasury and is earmarked for reduction of the national debt. It comes from the 55 members of the Warrenville Kiwanis Club and is an indication of the urgency that some of us view our fiscal situation. The Kiwanis members have decided they cannot sit back and wait for someone else to take care of this problem. And they have challenged the 9,000 other Kiwanis Clubs to match their contribution.

Mr. Speaker, we should heed an important message from America's heartland—Warrenville is a community of less than 10,000. Our foremost priority this session should be to make reasoned decisions targeting the waste that we all know exists in our Federal programs. It is also time to pass the balanced budget amendment and line item veto.

This check is an important reminder that our constituents want us to make those difficult decisions and they are willing to join us in their own unique way. Warrenville and America will be watching to see how we accept our challenge. I hope we remember it in the weeks and months ahead.

RELIEF FOR SMALL AIRPLANE MANUFACTURERS

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the General Aviation Standards Act of 1989. An identical bill passed the Public Works Committee unanimously last year and had the support of over 200 cosponsors.

The need for this legislation remains critical. The American general aviation industry has been brought to its knees and is currently threatened by foreign manufacturers; not because of an inability to compete, but because an unfair system of product liability laws is forcing U.S. general aviation manufacturers out of business.

The bill contains modest and reasonable changes in liability laws that apply to general aviation accidents, but contains no caps on awards or limitations on attorney's fees. It is supported by the entire general aviation community: manufacturers, consumers, and pilots.

I ask for my colleagues support for passage of this important legislation in the 101st Congress.

UNITED STATES SHOULD RESPECT POWER OF FREE ELECTIONS IN EL SALVADOR

(Mr. PACKARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to address the House today about the upcoming election in El Salvador. Some critics are calling for reduction in aid should certain parties win. I believe that this message hurts the democratic process by encouraging Salvadorans to vote out of fear. Democracy in Central America is fragile and should not be tampered with in this manner.

Therefore, I call on both Congress and President Bush to respect the election results. We cannot impose our own prejudices upon this critical vote. The people will have spoken in a fair and legal manner. Our job in this Congress is not to impede free elections, but to encourage them. Some Members forget this goal. Many of us have, and will work here in the Congress to see that the results of a fair election are supported.

Morton Kondracke recently stated in the New Republic that "the last thing the problem-ridden country of El Salvador needs is for the support of the United States to be in doubt." Mr. Speaker, our Government has a history of allowing democracies to perish. For once, let us respect the power of free elections and listen to the voters in El Salvador.

REFUSENIK WOMEN HUNGER STRIKE

(Mr. FRANK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, today begins a 3-day hunger strike in the Soviet Union by a group known as Jewish Women Against Refusal. They are a group of enormously brave and steadfast women who are protesting against the absolutely unjustified refusal of the Soviet Union to allow them and their families to emigrate. There have been in the past months and year improvement in the situation in the Soviet Union. It makes it all the more puzzling to us why people like these women and their families continue to be victimized and denied the most basic of human rights.

There is a very mixed picture right now and we appeal to the Soviet Union to understand that it is not only morally compelled, but in fact, it would be in their own interests to resolve these conflicts, simply to allow these people the basic rights that any human being ought to be able to exercise, and that is to leave a country when he or she is unhappy there.

The fact that so many of these women feel compelled to go on a hunger strike is an example of the depth of misery that they feel. It is a mark of the despair that they undergo. It simply is not worthy of any nation that wants to consider itself a great nation, to subject innocent people to this sort of punishment. I hope that Mikhail Gorbachev will heed the letters that I and others have written, that he will heed the pleas of these women and that he will, in fact, do what elementary human decency requires, allowing them to emigrate.

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD my letter to him and a statement from the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, including a statement from these women.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 8, 1989.

His Excellency MIKHAIL GORBACHEV,
Chairman of The Presidium of The Supreme Soviet, The Kremlin, Moscow 103132, R.S.F.S.R. USSR.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I write to you to express my continued support for family reunification, for the freedom of movement by registering my strong support for a group of women who today are starting a hunger strike to protest the continued refusals by the authorities to grant those women and their families permission to emigrate.

First, the women I want to note in particular are:

From Moscow: Inna Uspensky, Evgenia Berenfeld, Ludmila Fridman, Tatyana Futoryanskaya, Olga Goldfarb, Elena Golovina-Lokshina, Polena Golub, Tamara Gurfink, Galina Livshitz, Alla Varshavskaya, Marina Gorelic-Salganic, Judith Lurie, Natalya Magazanik, Rimma Mushinskaya, Mela Novik, Elena Rappaport, Marina Shulman, Irene Sterkina, Natalya Stonova, Irene Tyomkina, Ludmila Yakhontova.

From Leningrad: Sofia Wander, Sheyla Alexandrovsky, Olga Gersheles-Dinkins, Olga Komsitskaya, Irene Pisarevskaya, Lilia Rabinovich, Sofa Wanda-Benenson, Olga Kagan, Lidia Axelrod, Olga Kelman, Olga Osrivskaya, Tamara Pliss, Marina Shmidt.

From Kiev: Oxana Kotlyer, Lubov Rozenberg, Larisa Kitovskaya.

From Vilnius: Karmela Raiz.

From Irkutsk: Ala Stomatova.

From Kharkov: Irina Ichkina.

From Dneprodzerzhinsk: Anna Markova.

As you know, many members of this group have waited for more than a decade for permission to be re-united with family in Israel and elsewhere. The decision to deny permission to emigrate often has been on the basis of "state secrets." That decision often seems arbitrary and in conflict with your own public statements about the life-span of any such "state secrets."

The Soviet Union has made some important steps in the past year, and I have been very pleased by the significant increase in the number of exit visas granted. At the same time, I remain disturbed by the harassment subjected to those who have tried and tried again over the years to obtain permission to emigrate. The campaign to intimidate these women and their families remains. My concern for these brave individuals and their families also remains, and that concern is very strong.

On January 19, 1989, as you now, the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe confirmed the right to emigrate, including the essential assurance that that right would be observed. The Soviet Union, as you know, committed itself to this, and acknowledged its commitment within the Soviet press.

In the spirit of the very positive steps which the Soviet Union has made in the area of human rights, I ask for another positive gesture—the granting of exist visas for these women and their families.

Your prompt consideration will be appreciated, and I look forward to your response.

BARNEY FRANK.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOVIET JEWRY, STATEMENT BY REFUSENIK WOMEN ON THE EVE OF THEIR HUNGER STRIKE MARCH 8-10, 1989

As in the past two years, refusenik women declare a three day hunger strike on March 8, International Women's Day.

There have been certain improvements in the problem of emigration throughout 1987 and 1988. However, there is still no legal mechanism for solving the problem. This accordingly affects the fate of people tragically. Repeated promises by Soviet authorities to line the problem up with their international commitments remain empty words.

The Soviet authorities have now divided the problem of emigration into two spheres: one is for people who apply to emigrate for the first time and the other is the release of refuseniks. Thousands of people who first apply are allowed to go rather quickly, while refuseniks remain an object of endless political bargaining at international negotiations and harassments by bureaucrats at home.

Lawlessness and arbitrary rule reign towards refuseniks detained for reasons of "state security." In most cases, they have been held beyond all reasonable time limits. Their problem is not resolved. In many cases refusal of permission for them to emigrate is confirmed, their term of waiting being extended monstrously. More and more "security" refuseniks appear, receiving refusals as hitherto without any lawful grounds.

Another big group of refuseniks are the poor relatives. Their situation is vivid testimony that the Soviet authorities refuse to comply with their own legislation. As a result, hundreds of people, including many women and children, are denied defense under law and are doomed to wage an endless overwhelming struggle against cruelty and inhuman treatment.

As a whole, the refusenik situation today exposes the old absence of legal foundation for solving the human rights problem in the Soviet Union. Accordingly, we again appeal to the Soviet and foreign public to support our just fight for observance of the right to emigrate, both for those who have been waiting for years, and for those who hope to use the right but cannot do so because there are no reliable assurances.

The right to emigrate, including essential assurance that it will be observed, has just been confirmed by the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The conference confirmed that right on January 19 and its decision was published in the Soviet Press.

Will the Soviet Union once again refuse to honor its commitments, so that we will again remain deceived victims of lawlessness and arbitrary rule?

NATIONAL DAY OF CONCERN FOR THE SUDAN

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, people in Sudan are dying everyday. During the last 5 years, over 1 million people have died in the brutal civil war that ravages that country. Last year alone, between 250,000 and 500,000 people starved to death in Sudan.

I traveled to Sudan last January and in the camps I visited, I found many of the same images that haunted millions of Americans during the Ethiopian famine in 1985. We cannot just stand by as people are dying.

This week OXFAM America is sponsoring a National Day of Concern for the Sudan on Sunday, March 12. Americans are being asked to pray in their churches and synagogues and to undertake educational activities about the tragedy in Sudan.

OXFAM America is also urging people to congratulate President Bush for his quick initiatives to bring peace to Sudan and urge further positive actions.

Together, we can build momentum for peace in Sudan. I urge my colleagues and the American public to join with OXFAM America this Sunday in the National Day of Concern for the Sudan and to work for peace in that troubled land.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL PROHIBITING USER FEES FOR OUTPATIENT CARE AT MILITARY FACILITIES

(Mr. BUSTAMANTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will prohibit charging user fees for outpatient care in military treatment facilities.

Although active duty military dependents and retired military personnel and their dependents are currently entitled to medical care in military facilities at no cost, President Bush's budget request for fiscal year 1990 includes a proposal to impose user fees for such care. The budget proposal does not expand or improve the medical coverage of military retirees, it just charges them a fee for coverage they are already entitled to. This is nothing more than a new tax levied on active duty dependents and military retirees and their dependents.

The military services use the medical care entitlement as a recruiting incentive because it attracts people to join the military service for professional careers. Imposing a fee after promising free medical care to millions of service members constitutes a breach of faith by the Government. If implemented, the proposal would have a negative impact on recruitment, retention and, ultimately, on readiness. As a result instead of saving the Government money, the proposal will require more spending to maintain our readiness.

Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues' support for this legislation which will keep our commitment to military service members and avoid expensive remedies to maintain our readiness in the future.

A VOTE ON BASE CLOSURE BEFORE GAO REPORT WOULD BE UNCONSCIONABLE

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under the base closing commission legislation, Congress has 45 legislative days to reject the Commission's report.

A joint resolution rejecting the Commission's work was introduced last week. Under the law, the resolution could be brought to the floor for a vote within the next 2 weeks.

But Mr. Speaker, under no circumstances should the House consider the Commission's report without having the information on which it was based and an analysis of that information by the GAO.

For 7 weeks the Defense Department stonewalled us and provided little information so we could determine if the Commission's project cost savings are real. Now they are more cooperative, but the information we have seen to date raises serious questions about how the Commission came to its conclusions.

The GAO is preparing an independent analysis of the recommendations and the assumptions the Commission used. Given the complex nature of the report and the wide-ranging effects the closures may have, it is essential that we have GAO's analysis before any vote.

GAO knows how urgently their report is needed. In light of the hundreds of communities that may be adversely affected by a closure, a vote in the House before GAO's report is available would simply be unconscionable.

OUR DEBT POLICIES AS THEY RELATE TO THE THIRD WORLD

(Mr. JONTZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, newspaper headlines the last couple of days have reported that the Bush administration is growing concerned about developments in Latin America and is rethinking our Nation's Third World debt policies.

This rethinking is long overdue. The effect of our debt policies has been to lower the standard of living for millions of people in South America and Central America, to create economic and political instability in that region, and here at home to cut off foreign markets for American farm products at a time when exports are increasingly critical to American agriculture.

The simple fact is that in order to raise cash to send to the banks, Brazil and Argentina have increased agricultural production, have reduced internal consumption, and have undercut the United States in world oilseed and grain markets.

Mr. Speaker, as the Treasury Department considers our Government's approach to the debt crisis, the opportunities for increasing farm exports by relieving these nations of the necessity of raising so much cash to make debt payments should be kept in mind. It is not that we ought to ask that the concerns of American agriculture be the only interest of the Treasury Department in developing our debt policies, but they certainly ought to be one concern.

AUTHORIZING TELEVISION BROADCASTS TO CUBA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORSKI). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which would authorize the United States Information Agency to begin television broadcasts to Cuba.

For fiscal year 1989, $7.5 million was appropriated for the purchase, rent, construction, improvement, and equipping of facilities for TV Marti. The appropriation included funds for startup operations and a 90-day operational test which is not due to be completed until sometime in fiscal year 1990.

My bill would authorize $12 million for the remainder of fiscal year 1990 and a full $16 million for fiscal year 1991. I understand these amounts conform with the administration's plans for funding TV Marti and I further understand that a formal administration request for fiscal year 1990 funding at the $12 million level may soon be presented to Congress.

There could be no more opportune time than now to develop TV Marti. Last month, the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations released its report on the state of freedom in Cuba. The report made it clear that Fidel Castro continues to prevent the Cuban people from enjoying the same liberties and personal rights that are enjoyed by the people of many other countries in the Western Hemisphere.

Over the years, we have found that people are willing to risk quite a bit to learn the truth. All over Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, people have huddled long into the night to listen to such bearers of accurate, objective, and comprehensive news as the Voice of America, the BBC, Radio Liberty, and Radio Free Europe.

We now know that listeners in Cuba have been just as eager to hear the truth. A new survey shows that among recent Cuban arrivals to Panama, Madrid, and Miami, Radio Marti had been the "most listened to" radio station by 72 percent of the respondents and "listened to" by 86 percent of the sample. Only 44 percent reported "listening to" the most popular Cuban-operated station.

I believe those statistics are important. I remember the development of Radio Marti several years ago. Opponents of the station, groping for arguments, suggested that no one in Cuba would care, that they would view it as just another outlet for "Yankee propaganda." I believe these listener statistics should put those arguments to rest.

Today, Jorge Mas, the Chairman of the President's Advisory Board for Radio Broadcasting to Cuba, testified to the Subcommittee on International Operations. In his testimony, he makes a good point. Should Congress approve this bill, it will be the first time in more than 30 years that the Cuban people will be able to see pictures of the free world.

They say that a picture is worth a thousand words. I suspect that pictures of their neighbors in the Western Hemisphere would be worth a lot more to the Cuban people, who for an entire generation have been denied an opportunity to compare their lot with that of their neighbors. The contracts should be striking. For once, the Cuban people will get a graphic demonstration of the failures of the Castro revolution.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that broadcasts behind the Iron Curtain have been instrumental in forcing the Kremlin to concede certain freedoms to the people of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. So far, Fidel Castro has resisted making similar concessions. I believe TV Marti would be an excellent way to show the Cuban people what they too might accomplish with democratic political institutions and free markets.

PRIVATE LONG-TERM CARE INSURANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to provide for Federal and State standards for private long-term care policies.

As the Nation's elderly population grows the number of those requiring long-term care as well as the costs of what care will grow. As a result more and more individuals will seek to buy private long-term care insurance. It makes sense to develop the standards for regulating the sale of these policies while the long-term care insurance industry is still in its infancy.

Abuse of the public's trust has already been reported. Consumers Union, for example, reported in the May 1988 issue of Consumer Reports, that benefits and restrictions under current long-term care policies are at best difficult to understand. Because of the restrictions included in some policies, consumers who purchased these policies would receive virtually no protection against the costs of long-term care.

Federal and State standards are needed for long-term care insurance protection to prevent the same abuses which led the Congress to establish standards for Medicare supplemental insurance (MediGap) policies in 1980. As the Congress learned in the early days of the development of MediGap insurance, the elderly are vulnerable and can be frightened into buying useless or duplicative policies.

Long-term care insurance policies, unknown a few years ago, are now widely available. Currently some 70 companies have entered the field and are insuring approximately 500,000 individuals.

Unlike MediGap policies, which are regulated by Federal and State statutes, long-term care insurance policies are presently regulated in less than 20 States.

Finding ways to pay for long-term care is a serious problem today which will become even more problematic in the years to come. Currently about 2 million of the Nation's elderly are living in a nursing home. Thirty years from now that number will nearly double. Equal numbers of the elderly will also require long-term home- and community-based care. Nursing home care now costs an average $25,000 per year and as much as $40,000 in New York and California. By the year 2018, it will cost about $55,000 if inflation stays at the moderate rates experienced recently.

Medicare pays for about 2 percent of nursing home expenditures while Medicaid, the Federal program that finances health services for the indigent, pays half of the $38 billion presently expended for nursing home care. The other half of the $38 billion represents the out-of-pocket cost borne by nursing home residents or their children.

The bill I am introducing establishes standards and consumer protections for long-term care insurance policies along the lines developed to regulate MediGap policies. These standards are commonly referred to as the Baucus standards after Senator MAX BAUCUS, the chief sponsor of the legislation.

The General Accounting Office, in its report of October 1986, found that passage of the Baucus standards has encouraged States to adopt standards at least as stringent as the Federal standards. They also found that the Federal law had "resulted in more uniform regulation of MediGap insurance and increased protection for the elderly against substandard and overpriced policies."

The legislation I am introducing today is similar in design to the Baucus standards statute and should create similar impetus for states to establish minimum standards and consumer protections for the sale of long-term care insurance.

The bill is an updated version of H.R. 5085, which I introduced July 14, 1988. I have revised the legislation to take into account the following amendments the National Association of Insurance Commissioners [NAIC] added to their Long-Term Care Insurance Model Act and Model Regulations on December 16, 1988.

The NAIC Long-Term Care Insurance Model Act now contains a provision which prohibits long-term care insurance policies from conditioning eligibility for any benefits on a prior hospitalization requirement. This is a very significant change because, as Consumers Union points out, a majority of patients enter a nursing home without first being hospitalized. In short, eliminating the prior hospitalization requirement will mean that many more policyholders will be able to actually receive benefits under their policies.

The amended NAIC Model Act also prohibits conditioning eligibility for benefits provided in an institutional care setting on the receipt of a higher level of institutional care. This will again significantly expand the potential for receiving benefits under long-term care insurance policies as the elderly will be able to receive custodial care in a nursing home without first having to qualify for skilled nursing care.

The Model Act, as my legislation, now prohibits home health benefits from being conditioned upon the receipt of benefits in a prior institutional setting. Unfortunately, the NAIC did not go as far as my bill, and still allows policies under certain circumstances to condition eligibility of noninstitutional benefits on the prior receipt of institutional care. I am concerned that this provision will prevent too many elderly from receiving home health benefits under their policies and so have prohibited such conditioning of home health benefits in my bill.

I am also pleased to see the NAIC Model Act has been amended to improve the disclosure requirements so that it will be much easier to understand what the benefits and limitations in policies are. This will make it easier to compare one policy with another.

The NAIC Model Regulation has been amended to provide very important continuation and conversion rights for individuals who have bought group long-term care insurance policies and for various reasons lose eligibility to remain in the group.

The bill I am introducing today includes the disclosure and continuation and conversion amendments.

Further, in anticipation of action the NAIC is planning to take this summer, my legislation will require extended care insurance policies, that offer at least 6 months of long-term care, to be required to meet the standards contained in this bill. Currently, only those policies which offer at least 24 months of long-term care are regulated by the legislation.

The important features of the bill include:

MINIMUM STANDARDS

The bill establishes standards for long-term care policies requiring that they provide at least a minimum level of benefits, described below, and minimum expected loss ratios of 60 percent.

Like the MediGap amendment which incorporated the NAIC MediGap Model Act, the legislation incorporates most of the long-term care insurance model act and regulations developed by the NAIC and sets forth the same two procedures for determining whether policies meet the Federal standards.

The NAIC model and the additional provisions of the proposed bill would require that policies:

First, include a guaranteed renewal;

Second, include a 30-day return policy;

Third, limit preexisting condition clauses to 6 months for conditions for which medical treatment was recommended by a physician or received preceding or following the effective date of coverage;

Fourth, not condition benefits on prior hospitalization or institutional requirements or limit benefits based on prior receipt of higher levels of services;

Fifth, not limit coverage to skilled nursing care nor provide significantly more coverage for skilled care in a facility than coverage for lower levels of care in a facility;

Sixth, limit eligibility for benefits to services (in facilities or otherwise) licensed in the State;

Seventh, contain a statement of the availability of, and limitations upon, long-term care benefits under Medicare;

Eighth, provide continuation and conversion rights for group policyholders;

Ninth, provide to each policyholder the telephone number of the commissioner or superintendent of insurance of the State in which the policy is issued; and Tenth, provide at the time of solicitation a uniform disclosure statement.

Administration: The bill relies primarily on the States to enforce these standards.

Federal responsibilities involve determining whether State laws and regulations are equivalent to the Federal standards and certifying policies on a voluntary basis in States that do not have equivalent laws and regulations.

The bill provides that if a State has adopted standards that are at least as stringent as the Federal standards, policies regulated by the State are deemed to meet the Federal requirements.

The bill also establishes a voluntary certification program under which insurance companies could market policies as long-term care insurance in States that do not have laws and regulations equivalent to the NAIC model and the additional requirements.

Insurers can submit policies and supporting documents to the Secretary of Health and Human Services. If the Secretary determines that a submitted policy meets Federal requirements, it is certified and can be marketed as a long-term care insurance policy.

The bill establishes a Long Term Care Insurance Panel, consisting of the Secretary, three State commissioners of insurance and three individuals chosen from among Medicare beneficiaries and representatives of employers and labor. The panel is responsible for reviewing each State's insurance regulatory program and certifying those that meet the minimum standards contained in this bill. In States that do not obtain panel certification, as indicated above, the insurers may submit their policies to the Secretary of HHS for approval.

Penalties: The bill also establishes Federal sanctions, consisting of fines and/or imprisonment, for: (1) false statements or misrepresentation of a policy, and (2) mailing, advertising, soliciting, or offering to sell a policy that has not been approved by the Secretary or the State.

Other Requirements: To further protect policyholders, the Secretary would also be required to provide information to each Medicare beneficiary to aid in evaluating the value of long-term care policies and the relationship of any policy to Medicare benefits. Such information would include the addresses and phone numbers of State and Federal agencies which could provide additional information and assistance regarding long-term care policies.

The Secretary would also be required to inform Medicare beneficiaries of actions which are illegal and provide a toll free number and information on reporting suspected violations.

Mr. Speaker, senior citizens must be protected from abusive and misleading advertising and worthless long-term care policies. For MediGap policies this only occurred after passage of the Baucus amendment. My bill provides the Federal leadership required to assure reasonable and necessary regulation of the sale of long-term care insurance. I hope my colleagues will join me in speedy passage of this important legislation.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE REASON IN SMALL AIRCRAFT LIABILITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the General Aviation Standards Act of 1989. This bill passed the Public Works Committee unanimously last year and had the support of over 200 cosponsors.

The need for this legislation remains critical. The American general aviation industry—consisting mostly of small planes and helicopters—has traditionally dominated the international marketplace. However, this once great industry has been decimated and is currently threatened by foreign manufacturers, not because of an inability to compete, but because an unfair system of product liability laws is forcing U.S. general aviation manufacturers out of business. As a result, Socata, Grob, Porsche, Rushmeyer, Sammi, and Agusta soon could replace the household names of Beech, Cessna, and Piper as the world's leading manufacturers of general aviation aircraft.

Liability costs for American manufacturers have skyrocketed—from $24 million in 1977 to $210 million in 1988, despite a steady improvement in safety. Liability costs are now the largest single cost component in the manufacture of an airplane, pushing the price of new aircraft beyond the reach of many consumers. The direct result is a drop in new aircraft sales from 18,000 units in 1978 to only 1,085 in 1987. As many as 70 percent of the jobs in the industry have been lost since 1980.

Foreign manufacturers, not encumbered by the high liability costs of American manufacturers, are moving rapidly to fill the void. At a time when we are all concerned about the competitiveness of American manufacturers, we are witnessing the demise of a high-technology industry that historically has contributed greatly to the domestic economy and the balance of trade. Congress has a special responsibility, by virtue of the pervasive Federal regulation of this industry, to act to resolve this crisis by enacting uniform Federal standards of liability. The bill contains modest and reasonable changes in liability laws but contains no caps on awards or limitations on attorney's fees. It is supported by the entire general aviation community: manufacturers, consumers, and pilots.

I hope you share my concern for this important American industry and the thousands of jobs involved and I ask for my colleagues support in the 101st Congress.

E.B. LEON'S PASSING A LOSS TO ALL EL PASO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take this opportunity to note with great sadness but with equally great admiration the passing of one of the most outstanding citizens of El Paso, TX, Mr. Eucebio Beltran Leon, known affectionately to all as E.B. Leon. More than anything else, his story is one of unsurpassable individual courage and persistence against the most daunting odds. It is a saga that began with the heroic way in which he first came to the United States and ended with a rich legacy of individual, family, and civic accomplishments that his loved ones, friends, and fellow El Pasoans will continue to cherish with fond memory and stirring inspiration.

E.B. Leon can only be characterized as the classic American success story. He was born in 1912 in Durango, Mexico, where he lived until the age of three, when Pancho Villa raided Durango, killed Mr. Leon's father and confiscated the family ranch. The surviving members of the family then began a 2-year, 672-mile trek on foot that ended in El Paso, TX. They were penniless upon arrival, and for some time the family lived in a tent at Seventh and Oregon Sts.

E.B. grew up in El Paso and enlisted in the U.S. Navy in World War II, where he won 13 Bronze Stars in the capture and occupation of Saipan, Guam, the southern Palau Islands, Leyte, Luzon, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa. He was honorably discharged and took on a variety of jobs until he became an independent businessman in El Paso in 1954, an occupation he held for 27 years.

But he was concerned for far more than his immediate financial welfare. By the time of his death, he had dedicated 51 years of service to the League of United Latin American Citizens [LULAC]. He first joined LULAC in 1937 when he joined Council No. 34 in Albuquerque, NM. An organizer and community leader in his own right, he helped organize LULAC Council No. 8 in El Paso in 1945 and has since won a host of awards from and on behalf of the organization. From 1956 to 1958, Mr. Leon was the National Assistant Expansion Cochairman. His contributions were so great and his leadership so compelling that in 1958 he was recognized as "The Hardest Working Organizer in the State of Texas." In June 1987, he was honored as the longest living active founding father at the LULAC National Convention.

As amazing as it may sound, E.B. Leon didn't stop there. His boundless energy and enthusiasm for helping others carried over to other important interests as well. He was a member of the YMCA, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Toastmasters International and the Council on Aging, where after his retirement from business he worked as a trained alcoholism counselor. Until recently, he served as an Advisory Board Member on the El Paso City Council's "Retired Senior Volunteer Program."

Mr. Speaker, the lifetime of accomplishment left behind by E.B. Leon is testimony to the heartfelt power of the American dream. In a shallow day and age marked by the worship of money, machines, and technology, the intensely human drama of a lifetime of service to others stands in awesome contrast. The life of E.B. Leon represents to me the traditional values of earlier generations that revered family, neighborhood, duty, country, sacrifice, hard work, and dedication.

E.B. Leon dreamed big dreams and he never lost faith in the special dream he called America. He acknowledged the country's flaws, particularly the state of race relations in the Southwest, but he worked for change and indeed, he saw things change in his own lifetime as the result of his efforts and hundreds of thousands who shared his dreams for this country.

Mr. Speaker, we will all miss E.B. Leon. But his legacy lives on just as his dreams for America live on, and his life will serve as a sterling example for those he left behind. It sends the needed message to an all too complacent generation that the American dream is still the most powerful vision this world has to offer. And, on a more personal level, it means that I will miss him very much. He was a supporter, a hard worker, and most of all, he was my friend. I shall miss him dearly, and I know that the people of the 16th Congressional District of Texas extend their sympathies and best wishes to his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

[Mr. KYL addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

THE SATANIC VERSES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] and I take this time this afternoon to discuss an issue which should be of concern to everyone who cares about the right of public expression in this country and around the world. I want to speak just a very few minutes about my concerns about this issue and then yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, and to others who may want to be heard on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, there are certain fundamental human values that set the United States apart as a people and as a society. These are fundamental values which have characterized our history. The most important value in my own view is the diversity and the pluralism which have always characterized American life. Specifically, this value is seen in the first amendment to the Constitution which says:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

There are unhappily, Mr. Speaker, values which all people do not share. The majesty of the first amendment, this right of public expression, is a fundamental. It is easily accepted when we are dealing with noncontroversial issues. Every American endorses it when we deal with easy issues or noncontroversial issues.

No one objects to the Girls Scouts being heard, no one objects to the PTA being heard, no one objects to the local debating society. But the first amendment is tested when the words written and the words spoken are controversial. That is the case with the book entitled "The Satanic Verses," written by a man called Salman Rushdie.

While other countries may accept the Ayatollah's death threat against the author of this book, we in this country do not accept it; we reject it. Yet last week, Mr. Speaker, and the week before, we say a number of examples around the country where the Ayatollah's edict was accepted. We saw demonstrations and marches here, in the United States endorsing the Ayatollah's death sentence. There were attacks on Walden Books and on a bookstore in Berkeley, CA, called Cody's Books. There was the firebombing of the Riverside Press in New York City which a week earlier had published an editorial in defense of the book's publication. There are bookstores throughout the United States refusing to sell the book out of fear for the safety of their employees and their customers. There are libraries in the country refusing to carry the book.

In Britain the foreign secretary nearly apologized for the book. We heard former President Carter characterizing the book as "insulting." Both the British foreign minister and the former President of the United States missed the point. The point is now whether we like the book or do not like it. I suspect I would find it deeply offensive.

That is not the issue. The issue is the right of expression, the right to write a book, the right to read a book.

So this edict is having some effect throughout the United States. We see the cold hand of the Ayatollah, the cold hand of tyranny, being felt here in the sweet land of liberty.

These are always terribly painful and controversial issues. As I said, they are issues which are difficult and controversial. I remember some of them throughout my career here in the Congress. Should members of the American Nazi Party be permitted to march in Skokie, IL, home to so many Holocaust survivors? Should an artist's rendering which includes the desecration of the American flag in Chicago be closed by the courts? Should a Klansman elected in a free and fair election in Louisiana be seated in the Louisiana Legislature?

These are the tough questions that truly test whether or not we are sincere in our dedication to the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And when it comes to freedom of speech, there is no need to discuss the noncontroversial issues, only the ones that pain us and divide us.

But surely, Mr. Speaker, these are the cases that truly test whether or not we are sincere about our commitment to human freedom in the United States, no matter how offensive, no matter how repulsive, no matter how unpopular. Surely, Mr. Speaker, they test the strength of our system; they test the brilliance of our Constitution. Indeed they test the very meaning of American.

So, Mr. Speaker, I raise these issues here today in this place where controversy and debate are no strangers. If we can tolerate the most repugnant and the most repulsive ideas, then we can tolerate all ideas, and that is a good thing.

□ 1430

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that words written or spoken threaten free men and free women anywhere in the world, and, if we in this country do not speak out, who will?

Mr. Speaker, we gather here this afternoon to speak out and to reaffirm the right of free expression as it once again comes under attack.

It seems to me that this is a special and sometimes lonely obligation of the United States since we are the largest and the most powerful democracy on the planet. This task, therefore, falls to us and in many ways to us alone.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, thousands of our countrymen from Valley Forge, to Gettysburg, to the Argonne, to Hamburger Hill have died face down in the mud so that we could read and write what we want to read and write. We do not intend to dishonor their service by being silent on this subject today.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER] on a superb statement. I wish to associate myself with every word of it. I think he has expressed succinctly and effectively the thoughts of many of us who are troubled by the letting of a contract out by the spiritual leader of an important nation against an author who has written something that they have found highly offensive.

Mr. Speaker, we all see things and read things that are highly offensive and insulting to ideas and concepts and institutions that are near and dear to us. The movie, "The Last Temptation of Christ," is analogous. It traduced the focal point of Christianity. It was an insult, but I think the appropriate way to deal with those things is to express your opinion, express your freedom of speech in contradiction, in condemnation, even of something that one finds highly offensive about something that is sacred.

However, Mr. Speaker, at the same time to physically inhibit, whether by threats or in person, the exercise of first amendment rights is absolutely contrary to any civilized understanding of what freedom of speech really means. It means the right to say things that other people reject and do not like and condemn, but, so long as one is not yelling "fire" in a crowded theater, so long as there is not a clear and present danger, this right of a freedom of speech is one of the important, significant and, I am sorry to say, sometimes unique aspects of this ongong experiment we call American democracy.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that one of the lessons that we ought to dwell on from this unfortunate and ongoing occurrence is how often freedom of speech is violated, not by Ayatollahs, but sometimes by people from whom we have a right to expect better. I think of the occupation of the university.

Now universities are particularly citadels of free speech, libraries, thought, and ideas. These are the sum, the substance, the grist, of universities, of education, of learning, and, when things are said and taught, or thought to be said, or attempted to be taught that a group of students do not approve of, I think there ought to be other ways, and there are other ways, to demonstrate one's disapproval without physically making it impossible for the person who wishes to assert or speak the idea that others do not agree with. There are ways to express oneself.

Mr. Speaker, I think what happened at Howard University, no matter how one disagrees with Mr. Atwater's nomination as a director or a member of the board, the forbidding by physical violence of Mr. Cosby to even make his commencement address, the demonstrations—I am for demonstrating, but not when they involve the physical taking over of buildings and denying other people their right.

Now this has happened again and again on university campuses. Jeane Kirkpatrick was victimized in several universities, and I simply say this: This abhorrent Salman Rushdie series of events where the Ayatollah has threatened death, and has made it a holy cause and offered a reward for anyone that will assassinate someone for exercising their freedom of speech, which really is not just an American right; it is a natural right for every member of the human race; I just think we ought to learn that this extreme is not unknown in terms of the substance in America where freedom of speech is not quite tolerated as much as we think it ought to be, as I think it ought to be.

So, Mr. Speaker, let us look at this extreme example of intolerance, and let us try to speak out against all intolerance wherever it happens because the consequences of tolerating a little intimidation on free speech sometimes are manifest in this extreme fashion.

What is happening to this author is tragic. That anybody can defend it is even more tragic. It seems to me, despite the abhorrence in which one holds the demeaning or insulting of a religion, that ought to be an easy enough price to pay for the blessed right to express yourself.

So I congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER] for bringing this to the attention of the House, for taking this time, and I hope that we can all dwell on how precious and how fragile the right of freedom of expression is. All of us must dedicate ourselves to advancing that right wherever it is threatened.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] for sharing this time with me, and I am honored to be associated with him on this matter.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] for in a bipartisan fashion giving us a chance to express how important a basic principle is here under attack. I thought that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] was quite eloquent when he pointed out that we are talking here about people's rights to be offensive.

Mr. Speaker, yes, there are books written and movies made that have offended Islam, and Judaism and Christianity, and none of us believe that that is the correct thing to do, but we believe that it is in a free society a legally permissible thing to do, and the response is, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] said, the response is a very vigorous counterattack.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if one really believes that their religion is one with some force, then these thoughts of attack ought simply to inspire them, and the many who believe with them, to fight back. They have a right, as individuals and organizations, to boycott. No one has an obligation to buy. Private citizens who think that a particular form of expression is abhorrent should not pay the money for it. That is part of a free market that goes along with the freedom of expression that we have here.

But the notion that one has a right to prevent people from saying it is absolutely untenable, and what bothers me is people who write and say, "Well, but freedom of speech must be balanced by respect for other people's sensitivities. Freedom of speech can't be absolute in that it must not insult others."

Mr. Speaker, people do not understand one very clear thing. Freedom of expression only comes up when we are talking about opinions that are obnoxious and offensive to some people. If we are talking about opinions with which everybody agrees, freedom does not become an issue. Even Stalin thought that Molotov was free to agree with him. Hitler had no problem when Goebbels said things he liked. Freedom as a concept only comes into play when people have in fact said things with which one vehemently disagrees, and that is what we have to vindicate.

Now we have new horrifying degree of assault on freedom when the man who runs a country, the Ayatollah Khomeini, orders people to go and murder someone. It is bad enough when he prevents people from reading things in his own country, but when he announces that he has got a world right to censor what everybody reads and, in fact, to commit violence against the publisher or the author, that is an outrage, and when others fail strongly to condemn that, that is an equal outrage.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have to focus on the failure of many others who have some responsibility here to talk about what a disaster this is. The sad spectacle of the Ayatollah and his abhorrent version of his religion being so prominent and with so few others willing to be critical is a very sad one. That is not an accurate representation of Islam, and it ought to be made clearer by other believers in that religion itself.

There has to be an absolute insistence that people's rights to speak and publish cannot be trammeled by this sort of activity. I think it is incumbent on the Government of the United States and on the Government of Great Britain and other countries, none of us want to see money spent unwisely, but the only way to deal with this sort of threat is for all of us to pledge that resources will be put at the disposal of Mr. Rushdie, of bookstores, of publishers. If we have to spend more money to protect people, then we better do that, because if this threat succeeds in diminishing sales, et cetera, then know that it will become a model for many, many others to follows.

So it is absolutely essential that we make it clear not only that this is outrageous, but also that the right position is not halfway between. It is not to say, well, yes, they should not have threatened to kill him, but they should not have published the book, either.

It is not that, well, the Ayatollah went a litte too far, but Mr. Rushdie had no right to do that.

Mr. Rushdie has written a book which he had a right to write and he has an absolute right to be protected in its dissemination and it is an obligation of all countries.

People ought to understand, I have been involved in controversies that others have had here, we have Louis Farrakhan, a man who says on a regular basis some of the most despicable things I have ever heard. I have been asked by groups to help prevent him from having access to public forums.

I have said no, that is not appropriate. What is appropriate is to refute him. Do not patronize him. I do think it is legitimate to object to public funds being used to subsidize him, but if he wants to hire a hall and be available to people who want to hear him, then the only answer is to dispute him.

I am particularly troubled that some of the people who thought it was good when I defended the right of Louis Farrakhan to be hateful now write to me and say, "Oh, but this is a different story here, because Mr. Rushdie is being offensive."

People ought to understand that a commitment to freedom is not a tap they can turn on and off. If you are going to deny the right to be offensive and controversial to people with whom you disagree, you ought not to expect that right to be there when you yourself is the advocate of those kind of views.

I hope that people will pay attention to it. There is a broad specter of opinion of a bipartisan sort in this House and I hope that our Government and other governments at the State and local level will be encouraged to provide to people who are engaged in the sale and promotion of that book absolutely every protection that they can get.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for participating here.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER], for yielding this time to me and for having taken this special order. I want to express and associate myself with the two previous speakers, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] for their very eloquent statements.

I think it is right and appropriate that we stand here today condemning the actions of the Ayatollah Khomeini in connection with the book "The Satanic Verses" by Salman Rushdie.

It is imperative that, as a free society, we speak out when one of our important values, in this case freedom of expression, is threatened. Writers across the country and indeed the world have banded together to protest the death threats against Mr. Rushdie, his publishers, and booksellers who display the book. The United States must stand in solidarity with Mr. Rushdie and the international writing community against this brutal attack on freedom of expression.

While the Government of Iran has been engaged in various acts of extreme behavior for many years, until now it has not attempted to patrol the expression of the international artistic community through death threats and intimidation. All cultures and all freedom-loving people have an interest in stopping this most recent example of Iran's disrespect for the norms of international behavior.

Mr. Speaker, I have joined with a goodly number of our colleagues in writing to President Bush, urging him to put the Government of Iran on public notice that it is the United States' intention to postpone indefinitely any possibility of normalized trade or diplomatic relations until the threats have been rescinded and the safety of the author, publishers, and sellers of "The Satanic Verses" has been assured. Freedom of expression must not be silenced by intimidation, and that message must be sent to the Government of Iran.

The safety of Mr. Rushdie and of the principle of freedom of expression is clearly an American interest as well as a world interest. Let the Government of the United States join the many members of the international community who have spoken out to protect these interests and preserve artistic freedom.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for yielding to me and for giving me this opportunity by taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, before I give my statement, I would like to read into the RECORD a statement which just came across the Associated Press wire a couple of hours ago, because I think it underscores the seriousness which we are discussing here today:

BEIRUT, LEBANON.—The following is the text of a statement issued Wednesday by the Revolutionary Justice Organization, which holds American hostages in Lebanon. The Arabic-language statement was translated by The Associated Press in Beirut.

"In the name of the Almighty.

"After a thorough reading of The Satanic Verses book and its contents that insult Islam and the Arab prophet, and after examining the study of the so-called Salman Rushdie, the Revolutionary Justice Organization declares that it has completed its preparations to execute the just sentence issued by the esteemed cleric and the great struggler Ayatollah Khomeini against Salman Rushdie. Hence, it puts forward the following evidence for carrying out the sentence:

"1. Insulting Islam and the Arab prophet is an insult to the latest and greatest human civilization represented by revolutionary Islam.

"2. Salman Rushdie's record indicates that he was a branch member of the Freemasons' movement in England. Immediately after the publication of his Satanic Verses book, he was promoted to full official membership of the Freemasons' highest council in England (or the church of organized atheism) which combats divine religions, especially christianity and Islam and their great prophets.

"3. Imam Ayatollah Khomeini, with his acute awareness of the grave consequences against the future of the divine religions emanating from this Freemasonic and Zionist attack, has handed down his verdict when the Arabs and those who claim to be the protectors of Islam and speak for all the Moslems remained in tight silence.

"The Revolutionary Justice Organization also declares that before taking any measures, it will find itself compelled to attack British police posts assigned to protect Salman Rushdie in order to get to him to carry out the sentence. We hold the British government responsible in advance for the human and material losses among the British police and their posts that could result from the attacks on them. This warning applies to all countries that are currently negotiating with the British government to extend asylum and protection to Rushdie.

"Victory to the oppressed

"Glory and immortality to the martyrs

"The Revolutionary Justice Organization."

Mr. Speaker, the recent death threats by the Ayatollah Khomeini and others on the life of British writer Salman Rushdie demand the strongest possible condemnation by those who love our precious liberties.

Putting a price on Rushdie's head puts a price on the head of free men and women everywhere. We must not stand for it—we must stand united against it—and let the Ayatollah and his fanatical followers know unequivocally that if Rushdie is harmed, those responsible will suffer the gravest possible consequences.

When I was a very small boy, Mr. Speaker, the world was at war.

We lived then by a freight yard on the docks of Hampton Roads—overhead Navy dirigibles flew along the Atlantic coast, searching the depths for German submarines.

On the short wave of our old battery radio came the voices of Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and Adolph Hitler. At night, during the blackouts, my mother prayed quietly for an Allied victory over the forces of darkness.

Nearby was a naval hospital. When Taps was played, I was told, it meant that a serviceman had died. In my child's imagination, I would wonder who it was that had given his life for me. I would create a life for them even as they left this world—I would give them names and hometowns, places taken from the sides of the boxcars in the freight yard.

So, as Taps drifted across the tidal waters, I would imagine the soul of someone, perhaps named "Joe" from Rock Island, rising on the coastal breeze.

The forces of darkness were defeated. But Taps played often.

Mr. Speaker, when the quislings of corporate cowardice removed Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" from their shelves because of fear, we lost precious moments of freedom that can never be regained. These are moments that were purchased at the greatest price, by the ultimate sacrifice of men and women whose courage enables us to speak freely here in this Chamber today.

"Eternal vigilance," as Mr. Jefferson said, "is the price of liberty."

We must be vigilant, we must be unafraid, and we must be unequivocal when dealing with those who would forever silence the voices of dissent and disagreement, and take from us our right to think as a truly free people.

It is our duty to send an old-fashioned plain and simple message to the so-called religious fanatics who seek to forever silence Salman Rushdie.

We need also to remind those merchants of appeasement in the United States that although they have the right to remove a book out of fear, they have the moral responsibility to not give in to the bullies of intellectual intimidation and spiritual terrorism.

They owe that to those who have gone before—people like "Joe from Rock Island" for whom Taps was played when I was a little boy.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my distinguished colleagues for these special orders.

□ 1450

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER], for arranging this special order enabling us to speak out on this important issue concerning the freedom of expression.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] expressing the sense of Congress condemning the death sentence issued against British author Salman Rushdie by the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran, and to call for its immediate repudiation.

One of the basic tenets of a democratic society is freedom of expression. When that freedom is impugned through censorship, repression, or the threat of physical violence, it is incumbent upon the Members of this legislative body to express our outrage and indignation.

The recent death sentence decreed against British author Salman Rushdie is the latest manifestation of the bizarre, irresponsible behavior which has been the trademark of the Iranian leadership over the last decade.

With the recent cease-fire in the Iran-Iraq war, Iran should take advantage of the opportunity for rapprochement with the West. This recent episode, however, speaks against any hope for moderation in that troubled state. The death sentence against Salman Rushdie merely adds another chapter to the catalog of outrageous acts perpetrated by Khomeini, and must be condemned by those of us throughout the world who value freedom in all of its forms.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to adopt this resolution.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues, Mr. KOSTMAYER and Mr. HYDE for calling this special order to allow us the opportunity to express concern about the international incident resulting from the publication of Salman Rushdie's book, "Satanic Verses." This affair has tested the very principles on which our Government is based, freedom of speech and freedom of expression. I believe that it is important for us to challenge the decisions to restrict access to this publication, regardless of its contents.

The Ayatollah Khomeini's orders for the immediate execution of Mr. Rushdie and all of those involved in the publishing of this work cannot be tolerated. The American system is nourished by freedom of expression. While I may not agree with Mr. Rushdie's opinions, I respect his right to hold his own views. The suppression of the thoughts of others leads to oppression.

In the San Francisco Bay area, bookstore owners and managers are risking their own lives to ensure that "Satanic Verses" continues to be available to the general public. Last week alone, two bay area bookstores were fire-bombed in an apparent attempt to intimidate owners into pulling the book from their shelves. Despite these attacks, the two stores remain firmly committed to the rights of the book-buying public. I commend the owners, managers, and employees of these bookstores for their steadfast commitment to freedom of expression. It is important that we not allow these terrorist actions to injure or restrict the freedom that America cherishes.

I commend those members of the international community who have refused to be intimidated by the Ayatollah's threats. The free world must stand together in our responsibility to defend the free flow of thoughts and ideas. We must never allow any one person or group to forcibly impose their own values and ideas on the world community.

The uproar caused by the publication of "Satanic Verses" is damaging to the institution of American democracy. We must demonstrate our dedication to the values and principles which have helped to shape our Government by refusing to allow the Ayatollah Khomeini to dictate our domestic policy. Our Government must work to uphold the right of every American to have access to books representing varying viewpoints.

I urge our Justice Department to take an active role in pursuing those who have issued threats against retailers who offer their patrons the opportunity to purchase "Satanic Verses." We cannot tolerate these direct attacks on the freedom on which we pride ourselves.

Again, I thank my colleagues for calling this important special order, and I look forward to working with them to ensure the protection of freedom of expression.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks in connection with this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORSKI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

[Mrs. BENTLEY addressed the House. Her remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA, ON HIS 87TH BIRTHDAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAHALL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, few Members of either the House of Representatives or the U.S. Senate ever attain legendary status. Fewer still attain that status while they are still alive. But we are today honoring one of that rare group, my friend and long-time mentor Jennings Randolph.

Fifty-six years ago, in 1933, Jennings Randolph was sworn in as a Member of Congress. Fifty-six years ago, he began to work diligently to improve the way in which Government worked to overcome problems, to make America great. His service to this Nation, while a Member of the House of Representatives from 1933 to 1947, and in the U.S. Senate from 1958 to 1984, spanned one-quarter of the life of this Republic.

I had the honor to work closely with Jennings Randolph from my first day as a Member of the House more than 12 years ago, and before that as an employee of the U.S. Senate in the Democratic Cloakroom under Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. The experience has been among the most rewarding aspects of my service in Congress, and I'm proud to say, I still work closely with this great American.

On this, the occasion of his 87th birthday, I am pleased to pay tribute to this most senior and most beloved public servant from the great State of West Virginia. As he would say and did say when I last talked to him just 2 days ago, and as I would wholeheartedly agree, Jennings Randolph is today 87 years young.

In the Senate, a body where perhaps no one is more conscious of its unique code of activity, nor where the rule of courtesy is so zealously enforced, Jennings Randolph made it unnecessary for freshman Senators to search for a printed book of etiquette that could instruct them in the management of relations between Members. No such publication exists, because the rule of courtesy and the forms of civility in that Chamber were learned by example only—and Jennings Randolph instructed by personal example in the subtle ways of representative government.

During his service in the House of Representatives, Jennings Randolph began to search for a way to establish a national energy policy; he introduced legislation in 1942 known as the Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act that would have created ways in which to transform coal and its products into other useful energy forms. For example, in the early 1940's he copiloted a plane flown from Morgantown, WV, to Washington, DC, using fuel made from coal.

One of his last acts as a U.S. Senator was to see the creation of a peace arm of the Government, the U.S. Institute of Peace, the culmination of an effort Jennings Randolph began in 1945 as a Member of the House of Representatives. The U.S. Institute of Peace has been operating for the past 5 years, thanks to the efforts Jennings Randolph made way back before 1948, when we still had a Cabinet level Department of War.

In 1933, Roosevelt and Randolph were the New Deal twins, and there have been few Members of Congress in either body who stood more clearly for the enduring values of hope and human progress for which Franklin Roosevelt stood than Jennings Randolph did throughout his long and distinguished career. And today, he could tell us as clearly as if it were yesterday about the first 100 days of Franklin Roosevelt's Presidency.

Senator Jennings Randolph grasps better than most men the latent, untapped talents, and abilities that lie in almost everyone. And he has lent and to this day is still lending his efforts and his time to what they might never have become without his help and concern.

Some examples of his golden opportunities for others for which he worked throughout his career include the students he taught at Davis and Elkins College, at Salem College his own beloved alma mater, and at Southeastern University in Washington, DC. He is known for always challenging the young, among them participants in the National Youth Science Camp, the YMCA, the Metropolitan Police Boys and Girls Club, the National Youth Governors Conference—all of whom have benefited from his experience and dedication.

Across America today, blind people and other handicapped men and women and children owe a debt to Senator Randolph. Through the Randolph-Sheppard Act for the Blind, and the Education for all Handicapped Children and Adults Act, Jennings Randolph created futures for the blind and handicapped—futures that included the ability to earn a living, and to become proud and productive people. He established and chaired the first Subcommittee on the Handicapped under the parent Committee on Labor and Human Resources until the Senate gained a Republican majority in 1981. Jennings Randolph quite literally reduced the obstacles that would have imprisoned physically and mentally disabled people, bringing light into the lives of those who could not see, and a smooth path for those who might have stumbled.

Through his efforts as chairman of the Public Works and Environment

Committee in the Senate, which he ably chaired for 14 years, Jennings Randolph authored the original Appalachian Regional Commission, and the Economic Development Administration, which brought roads, bridges, health care facilities, better schools, and many jobs to West Virginia and the rest of the Nation, but particularly to the 13 Appalachian States. It was during this time that he fought with the Corps of Engineers—and won—to call their dams and reservoirs "lakes." There are now eight of them in West Virginia, and so naming them has meant a great deal to the tourism industry that has been carefully crafted in our State for many years.

It was in his Senate years that he created what is now known as the Interstate Highway System, which now serves our State and the Nation, setting the stage for a better life for millions now living, and for generations to come.

During his tenure in the Senate, he came to be known as America's environmental architect in the legislative arena. His pace never slackened, and his work brought forth the Clean Air and Clean Water Acts, the Superfund Program to clean up toxic waste, and solid waste disposal.

Serving as the ranking Democrat on the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee Jennings Randolph brought into being the Black Lung Compensation Act for those, who due to their work deep in the coal mines of West Virginia and other coalmining States, were dying of that progressive disease known technically as pneumoconiosis.

Jennings Randolph is the author of the 26th amendment to the Constitution of the United States which gives 18- to 20-year-olds the right to vote, a franchise he believes they deserve because, as he says, if an 18-year-old is mature enough to be expected to fight and perhaps die for his or her country, and is old enough to be considered a responsible adult under our laws, they should be allowed to vote.

Jennings Randolph introduced and guided to enactment the first Airport Authority Act which resulted in the building, extension, or renovation of airports throughout the country, enabling the people in America to enjoy the ease and speed of those new-fangled jet airplanes, and a much expanded airline industry. Later, he was one of only nine Members of the Senate to vote against airline deregulation. He did so because he believed the improved and increased service to such small rural States such as West Virginia would be seriously impaired by deregulation, and that such impairment could lead to an economic downtrend in the efforts being made by his State and its representatives to attract and keep new business and industry and the jobs they brought with them.

He introduced legislation, so early on that it was first named the National Aeronautics Museum, but which took so long to guide to enactment that its name had to be changed to the Air and Space Museum, because by that time men had walked on the Moon. Such was the vision of this courageous man.

He is a leader, who leads through the whispered confidence, the silent gesture, the humorous anecdote, the gentle rebuke, the welcome plaudit, and all of the characteristic wit and wisdom of a gentleman. He embodies the finest traditions of the House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate, and of our great country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall that many years ago they asked the great physicist, Lord Rutherford, how he always happened to be riding the crest of the wave. And he replied, "Well, I made the wave didn't I?" And that is how we think of Jennings Randolph today—he helped make the waves and then found realistic solutions that have made the difference in quality of life for not just West Virginians, but all Americans.

William Shakespeare might have been talking about Jennings Randolph when he said: "Age cannot wither him nor custom stale his infinite variety." Throughout his brilliant career and to this day his vision never dims, and his convictions never waver—and because of that we have a national transportation system, safer workplaces, a cleaner environment, the right to a decent education and decent health care, and the hope of a better life for all.

From all of West Virginia, happy birthday, Senator Jennings Randolph and God willing, may you have many, many more. Our thoughts and our prayers are with you.

□ 1500

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAHALL. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, fourscore and eight years ago a man was born in West Virginia. He was born to a family in north-central West Virginia that nurtured an appreciation of service to his fellow man. He served 14 years in this House and 26 years in the U.S. Senate. That man is a legend to those of us who know him. That kind and gentle public servant is Jennings Randolph.

Senator Randolph is a hero to millions of people in this country. He was a tireless advocate for people who worked hard for their livelihood and championed legislation that helped those who needed a helping hand.

He was the last of the Roosevelt "New Dealers" to leave Congress at the end of the 98th Congress. Winning his election in 1932, he came to Washington inspired to make a difference, and he did.

He championed legislation for clean water, clean air, mine safety, black lung programs, the Air and Space Museum, the Appalachian Regional Commission, National Labor Relations Act, the Randolph-Sheppard Act, education, and for the handicapped. He is the father of modern commercial aviation, however; he is most proud of his original sponsorship giving 18-year-olds the right to vote. Many of us here in this Chamber were first able to vote due to this man's efforts.

He first proposed that a Cabinet-level Department for Peace be formed. We are still working on the scaled-down version of his vision, and many people from his old district would welcome the Peace Academy.

He was at a reception for me nearly a year ago. He was and always will be a perceptive thinker. He dislikes the title "Congressman" and was letting all know that we are U.S. Representatives, servants of the people who elect us to this position of high public trust.

He was, up until he retired over 4 years ago, the only Member of the U.S. Senate with a listed telephone number in the District of Columbia. It was not unusual for people from West Virginia to call his home in the evening or on a weekend if their car broke down while visiting our Nation's Capital.

Senator Randolph said, "I had an overriding desire to help people, to upgrade, to benefit our people." That is why my family, the people of his district, and I are pleased to honor one of America's best. Jennings Randolph served the people of the Second Congressional District of West Virginia and later the entire State of West Virginia as Senator. He is the portrait of what a representative of the people should be.

I am pleased and honored to join my colleagues in wishing our dear friend my best wishes on this, his 87th birthday.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride, honor, and admiration that I rise today on the occasion of the 87th birthday of Senator Jennings Randolph.

Senator Randolph has set the finest of examples by both his deeds and his conduct. This is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that he earned enormous respect on both sides of the Senate aisle for his mastery of the art of legislative compromise and the tenacity with which he pursued his goals.

Senator Randolph's contribution to our State of West Virginia is equally enormous. The work he has done on infrastructure development and the Interstate Highway System will provide opportunities for many generations. Legislation such as the National Energy Security Act has served to keep mining alive and a tradition for West Virginia's economy, security, and heritage.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to be raised in West Virginia and not be inspired by this man. Excellence is synonymous with Jennings Randolph. Many do not realize that his legacy as an athlete is as rich as that of a statesman. He has greatly influenced both athletic and academic programs at Davis and Elkins College and Salem College, two of West Virginia's small, independent colleges.

Senator Randolph always took time to work on projects to benefit the young. From his early days as the athletic director of Davis and Elkins College in his hometown of Elkins, WV, to the fight he led to grant 18-year-olds the right to vote, he has exerted a positive and priceless influence on our Nation's youth.

Mr. Speaker, West Virginia has produced many great leaders, heroes, and statesmen. I can think of none who better exemplifies these traits than Senator Jennings Randolph. We are all greatly indebted and enriched for having worked with him.

Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to pay tribute to a man who is known as a true legend is very rare. Today, we have that rare opportunity—the 87th birthday of our friend, former U.S. Senator Jennings Randolph.

Senator Randolph's name has a magic ring to it in West Virginia. From the steelmills of the northern panhandle to the coalfields of the south and from the river towns along the Ohio to the apple orchards near Harpers Ferry—Jennings Randolph is remembered fondly as a champion of Mountain State causes and friend to all who sought his wisdom and leadership.

He came to Congress in good company, taking his oath of office in 1933—the same year that Franklin Delano Roosevelt took the Presidency and proceeded to guide America through the perils of depression recovery. Randolph worked his early years in the House to support FDR's recovery initiatives. For seven straight terms, Senator Randolph represented his beloved fellow West Virginians in this Chamber. During that time he also became West Virginia's congressional champion of coal.

There are few West Virginians over 50 who do not remember or have not heard about the Senator's dramatic demonstration of the value and abilities of synthetic fuels derived from coal. In November 1943, during a world war in which fuel had become a most prized commodity, Senator Randolph boarded a small single-engine airplane in Morgantown, WV, and flew to Washington, DC. It doesn't sound so unusual until you consider that the fuel that powered the prop wasn't a conventional oil derivative. Coal was the power supply for that promising flight of 1943. Senator Randolph hoped that it would show a fuel-hungry America that West Virginia coal has the answer to fuel problems and oil shortages. Along with Senator Joseph O'Mahoney of Wyoming, then-Congressman Randolph introduced the Synthetic Fuels Act that was to provide funding and encouragement for the further development of liquid fuels from coal.

But, America's war victory and postwar progress led to the gradual lessening of the need for a synthetic fuels effort and the program eventually became dormant. It was most frustrating to Senator Randolph who was powerless to save the program. The 1946 election swept 156 incumbents from the U.S. House of Representatives including Randolph.

The late Representative from Kentucky, Carl Perkins, wrote that if government and industry had followed Senator Randolph's advice on synthetic fuels development, America would have been spared the postwar mining slump, the shock of the oil crises of the 1970's, and our dangerous dependence upon foreign energy. His synthetic fuels dream was not to be. In 1983, when he sought to recreate his historic 1943 flight, Senator Randolph could secure no more than 1 pint of synthetic fuel.

When he returned to Washington in 1958, he returned as a U.S. Senator and a new legacy of innovation and progress began under his stewardship. The Randolph-Sheppard Act that gave blind people the opportunity to operate vending stands in Government buildings; the 26th amendment to the Constitution which gave 18-year-olds the right to vote; measures that led to the National System of Interstate Highways that link America's great and small cities with efficient highways; legislation creating the National Air and Space Museum which millions of people visit in Washington; environmental protection initiatives; economic assistance programs to bring jobs and business opportunity to lagging areas of America; legislation to create a Peace Academy, the Economic Development Administration, and the Appalachian Regional Commission—they were all authored or influenced by Senator Jennings Randolph and have become part of the Randolph legend.

He served as chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee and a host of other respected and influential boards, caucuses, and committees. In spite of that impressive list of accomplishments and activities, Senator Randolph always had time for his people—whether it was the small boy at a West Virginia function who desired an autograph or the senior citizen who wanted the Senator to know of a personal difficulty, Senator Randolph always had the time to be West Virginia's friend in the U.S. Senate.

His retirement in 1985 was met with many mixed emotions—his fellow West Virginians were saddened over his departure, but all wished him well in his search for new challenges and activities. Now, we are celebrating Senator Randolph's 87th birthday with fond memories and warmest regards for his service and friendship of so many years.

He is fond of remarking how his political career really began as he sat on his father's knee at the Democratic National Convention of 1912 and absorbed the color, excitement, and passion of politics when Woodrow Wilson was nominated for his first term as President. That was a fateful convention for West Virginians because it sparked a 10-year-old boy's imagination and interest in politics—an interest that was to guide him for the next 70 years and inspire him to accomplish great deeds for his State and Nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride, pleasure, and honor that I join my colleagues in wishing our dear Senator Jennings Randolph warmest wishes for a happy 87th birthday. He has forever left a mark of hard work and accomplishment upon Congress, West Virginia, and America.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORSKI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

[Mr. OWENS of New York addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

CELEBRATING THE LIFE OF DIDI DANIELS PETERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to celebrate the life of Didi Daniels Peters—a truly beautiful woman who succumbed to a long illness on Saturday, February 25, 1989. She will be missed by all of us who were blessed to have known her.

I first had the pleasure of meeting Didi with her husband Brock the world-renowned actor, singer, and producer, in their home in Hollywood. That meeting had a profound impact on my congressional career.

I had been invited to Brock and Didi's home by my colleague JULIAN DIXON. He was meeting with the Peters's and other renowned African-American actors, writers, and producers—who had come together as the National Alliance for Black Advancement in Communications—to discuss the absence of positive African-American images in film and television. I had not intended to participate in the meeting at all, I merely was going to audit the conversation.

But their concerns were so compelling I could not maintain my passive posture. That first meeting with Didi and the others caused me to join the Telecommunications and Finance Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee so that I could do my part to help change the images our children see.

In subsequent years Didi and Brock helped to focus Congress' attention on the shameful absence of positive African-American images in film and television. Brock and Didi were a uniquely creative husband and wife powerhouse—their collective legacy will be with us always.

Didi was a pioneer—a modern-day heroine. She dedicated her life to the arts and as a result she enriched our lives as well as this Nation's cultural heritage.

Didi was among the first African-American women to break the gender and color barriers in television production with her "Jazz Party" series—the first regular television series on jazz. Her love for jazz led her to own WNCN in New York, the first all jazz radio station in the United States.

She also became one of the first women executives in the recording industry when she became an assistant publicity director for United Artists records.

Didi's creativity knew no bounds. When she was the national funding director of the NAACP, she created the national "Bank of Stars," a year of concert tours in major cities which featured starts of music, poetry, and literature.

Before moving to the west coast, Didi founded the Dance Theater of Harlem Advisory Board and Guild and was a founding board member of the Museum of African American Art.

My love for Didi is deeply grounded in my sincere appreciation for her labor of love—Maga Link, Inc. Didi was quick to say that the creation of Maga Link was her proudest professional achievement.

Maga Link, which was founded by Brock and Didi, spawned Communications Bridge Institute, the first institution of its kind dedicated to the professional career training of low-income, minorities, and women in videotape technology.

Brock and Didi began this training program because, as Didi stated in 1983:

> It's very hard for minorities and disadvantaged people to get training. They can't afford it. And the school system doesn't concentrate on the media. * * * We didn't want these students to be locked out of the future.

Future generations owe a debt of gratitude to Didi for her vision and foresight.

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LELAND. I am glad to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from the great State of Maryland.

□ 1510

Mr. MFUME. I certainly want to commend the gentleman from Texas for taking time under this special order to commemorate the life and the legacy and the work of Didi Peters.

Many of us who admired her from afar, who had the opportunity, once, twice, or just casually to meet her, who were really the beneficiaries of her works in the area of communications and broadcasting, certainly hold a deep debt of gratitude and a great deal of respect for all she did to make things better for those of us who came through that same door; but more importantly for those who still yet come behind us.

I think the gentleman is certainly right in suggesting with a great deal of emphasis that Didi Peters was really a heroine in her own time, a trailblazer in many respects for the causes of the furtherance of the arts, particularly as they affect African-ancestored Americans.

Her work with the Dance Theater of Harlem, with Maga Link, with the NAACP Arts Program, are just a few of the many examples that we could take time on this floor, through this special order, to cite.

But perhaps most of all I think her legacy and her impact will probably be measured like the impact and the legacy of the teacher, and that is that it goes on generation after generation, and that generational effect and that generational impact really means that Didi Peters will live long beyond this day, and her work and all that she stood for, and in many instances sweated for, will live on also.

So I join with the gentleman from Texas in taking a moment to express my gratitude for all of her work, as one who benefited in the area of broadcast communications. I know I speak for all people in the performing arts as it relates to their ability now to take advantage of situations that had not previously existed, but more importantly for having someone such as her not just to go up to the door and knock, but really to push the door wide open.

She served as a bridge, in many respects, that we might run across and get to the film industry, get to the broadcast industry.

So my condolences to the Peters family; my thanks also to the Peters family for letting this Nation share with them the beauty of Didi Peters and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. LELAND. If the gentleman will remain for just a minute, I would like to, in just some conversation with him, acknowledge the fact that their daughter, Lisa, is bound to carry on that legacy, too. She, too, is a link to the future for Brock and Didi.

I am very proud of the association that I have had with that family, especially through a very personal relationship between myself and Brock and Didi.

I am also very excited about the legacy that Didi has left because in fact if you look at the television prime time soap operas, you will see Diahann Carroll playing on "Dynasty." I will tell you that Diahann Carroll did not get there by herself. It was the hard work of people, people led by Didi, Brock, Robert Hooks, George Standford Brown, and many others who have come together to put leverage on the industry in Hollywood, the independent producers, the TV network owners, and all of them coming before Congress and appearing before my subcommittee on two different occasions, one in Hollywood, and on the other occasion in Washington when in fact they impressed the leadership of those stations, those institutions enough to at least give them some illustration, or illumination, if you will, that African-Americans were not present in positive roles to the extent that they should be; they were not following the objectivity of where other folks were, given the vacuum that was created by blacks only participating, in front of the cameras at least, as far as their roles, playing comedians and so forth.

So when we look at the credits as they roll after the movies that we see on television and in the movies, when we realize those black names and Hispanic names and women playing greater leading roles, we will remember Didi Peters, because she was in the forefront, the avant-garde, if you will, in getting those folks there.

As many skills as those credits might represent today, at least some advancement was realized.

Mr. MFUME. Well, a great deal of advancement certainly is being realized even though—and I am sure Mrs. Peters would be the first to admit—that there are many more hurdles to overcome. In thinking, really, about her contribution to this industry and to African-ancestored Americans and in doing so to America, I am reminded of the old gray-haired builder who, at the end of his own life, was still building yet another bridge. There were those who mocked and jeered and questioned the merit of this activity so late in his own life. When asked, he responded, he said, "Good friend, in the past I have come, traveling after this road, there is a youth who must pass this way. And that chasm that has been not for me, for that wide-eyed eager, anxious, ambivalent, sometimes abused young person, that may be a pitfall be." He said, "They too must cross in the twilight dim. So I stand here today and build this bridge for him."

Mr. Speaker, I thank Didi Peters for all the bridges she took time to build, even in the twilight of her own life. Again, as I said earlier, so that we might use them to run across and to get into positions that would make this a more equitable and fair society in terms of the arts and would move more importantly to better shape the images that are so readily ingested by the American people.

Mr. LELAND. What a most eloquent statement for a most beautiful woman.

Let me say that that bridge she is indeed today, as I have alluded to. I am reminded also that Didi built many other kinds of bridges.

By the way, when I was talking, she did not talk about blacks or African-Americans, if you will, and other ethnic minorities, in just appearing before the cameras. She also fought so that she had a strong and positive campaign which she led to make sure that blacks were also writing scripts, other ethnic minorities were producing and doing all of the things that needed to be done to make the screen presentations whole.

She was an unyielding, very eloquent spokesperson for that effort and for that we will indeed be forever thankful.

I am so very grateful to the gentleman from Maryland for adding his great praises to this great woman. I do appreciate all that he has said.

I might add that there are other Members of Congress who just could not be here, who want to be here, but who will submit their statements in writing.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor the life and accomplishments of a good friend and a pioneer in the arts, Ms. Didi Daniels Peters, well-known producer, publicist, and community activist, and wife of world-renowned actor/singer and producer Brock Peters, died in Los Angeles on Saturday, February 25, 1989, after an extended illness. She was 59 years old.

The Philadelphia, PA, native was cofounder, with her husband Brock, of Maga Link, Inc., which created Communications Bridge Institute, the first institution in the Nation for the professional career training in videotape technology of low-incomed minorities, and women. Maga Link, Inc., was recently named by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting as the CPB Consortium for Black Programming to the Public Broadcasting System for the development, production, and distribution of programming to stations nationally and to PBS educational and cultural institutions.

Ms. Peters was one of the first black women television producers in the country. One of her productions, "Jazz Party," the first regular television series on jazz, earned her an Emmy Award nomination. As assistant publicity director for United Artists Records, she became one of the first female executives within the record industry.

She was founder of the Dance Theater of Harlem Advisory Board and Guild and founding board member of the Museum of African American Art. Ms. Peters was also one of the founders of the Media Forum, an organization consisting of a group of eminent media personalities who produce seminars, forums, and concerts designed to inform the public about media imagemaking. This group's television special, "Voices of our People," won ten Emmy awards in 1984. She also served as a trustee of the Bella Lewitzky Dance Foundation and of the Dance Gallery, a group which constructed the first theater ever built for dance in the history of the art form. This facility is located in downtown Los Angeles.

The jazz lover was once the owner/producer of WNCN in New York, the first all-jazz radio station in the United States. This station, which set the precedent for such stations which followed, featured major musicians and critics as regular disc jockeys. Included were "Cannonball" Adderly, Duke Ellington, Horace Silver, Leonard Feather, Nat Hentoff, and others. She later became the national funding director of the NAACP for which she created the national "Bank of Stars," a year of concert tours in major cities which featured stars of music, poetry, and literature. As a tribute to this project, Max Roach wrote his groundbreaking "Freedom Now Suite."

Having become highly discontent with the quality of black-oriented films of the late 1960's and the early 1970's, Ms. Peters and her husband started a production company, Delbro Enterprises. This company produced such award-winning projects as the PBS–TV special "This Far by Faith" and the feature film, "Five on the Black Hand Side," a family comedy which broke the "blaxploitation" trend of this period.

This uniquely creative husband and wife team also produced numerous internationally acclaimed benefit events for the issues and organizations to which they were both committed. Included are the "Harlem Homecoming" series for the Dance Theater of Harlem; "Hallelujah" at the Forum; "Soul Food at the Waldorf" for the Free Southern Theater; "The American Tap Show" for the Dance Gallery, and the Olympics Arts Festival.

Ms. Peters earned here M.A. degree in political science and administration with honors under a fellowship at Howard University. She later studied at the University in Copenhagen, as a fellow of the Scandinavian American Foundation. Her works have also been cited into the U.S. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on three occasions. Her awards include the NAACP National Humanitarian Image Award; the Delta Sigma Theta Fortitude Award; was named as one of the 10 most distinguished black women in 1984 by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund; the Rosa Parks Award of the U.S.C. Black Woman's Caucus in 1982. She has also been the recipient of many citations from mayors, Governors, State, and national legislators, and leaders for her outstanding professional and community activities.

During a recent interview, the legendary achiever was asked about that in her career of which she was most proud. "That's an easy one," she readily responded. "I am proudest of my part in creating Maga Link, Inc., which now trains over 35 percent women for 'behind the camera' jobs and the Dance Theater of Harlem which destroyed the stereotypical view that blacks didn't have the 'arch' for ballet." She continued, "But I am filled with both pride and joy as I look back over the 27-year 'Brock and Didi' partnership. There have been a lot of liberal and sensitive men who opened those 'first' doors for me. I was lucky enough to marry one who has understood what the word 'partner' really means."

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sorrow that I join the distinguished Member from Texas, Congressman MICKEY LELAND, the Congressional Black Caucus, and the thousands of voices today that are resounding as one to speak on the life and legacy of Didi Daniels Peters—an accomplished producer, publicist, and community activists. But even more fondly to remember, she is the wife of world-renowned artist Brock Peters.

Mr. Speaker, as I take his moment to reflect on the life of one of history's most powerful black women, I cannot help but to enunciate those words that the founder of the National Council of Negro Women, Mary McCloud Bethune, has bestowed upon women of color as a guiding light on the road to success. She stated, "when the door of opportunity opens be ready to put your foot in."

Venturing into a field that was heavily dominated by men and equally nonminorities, Didi Daniels Peters premiered in the television industry as one of the first black women television producers in the country. Turning to the recording industry, she is acknowledged, in her capacity as an assistant publicity director for United Artists Records, as one of the first female executives in the record business.

The Dance Theater of Harlem, which many of us in the Congress have enjoyed over the years, could not have realized its importance or diversified potential without the insight of Didi who recognized the need to set up the Dance Theater of Harlem advisory board. And the list of her many achievements goes on and on.

But Mr. Speaker, there is one important element in her memoirs that captures the essence of Didi Daniels Peters. Is it not a beautiful testimony of life when a man and woman can come together in a "partnership." Responding to the question of the most proud moment in her career she stated, "But I am filled with both pride and joy as I look back over the 27-years 'Brock and Didi' partnership. There have been a lot of liberal and sensitive men who opened those 'first' doors for me. I was lucky enough to marry one who has understood what the word 'partner' really means."

Mr. Speaker, it is always a moment of sadness to learn of the passing of one who has contributed so greatly to the social, political, and cultural development of this Nation. So as we speak about Didi Daniels Peters today—reflect in silence on her today—let us remember her as a gift of love which we were given to learn from and to enjoy.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I rise today to pay my respects to a dedicated and motivated woman, Mrs. Didi Daniels Peters. Didi, a long-time, personal friend passed away on Saturday, February 25, 1989, after struggling with an extended illness. Didi will be remembered not only as a wonderfully caring individual, but also as a shining star of the black community who contributed to the enlightenment of our society. Didi was a well respected producer, publicist, and community activist and will truly be missed by those of us who were privileged enough to know her. She was a true inspiration to us all. Together with her husband, Brock Peters, a world-renowned actor, singer, and producer, they worked to improve miniority participation and portrayal in film and television, as well as greatly enhanced our cultural involvement in the arts.

Didi's accomplishments and contributions can best be appreciated when reflecting upon the description of a young black man's search for his identity in Ralph Ellison's 1952 novel, "The Invisible Man." Tragically, this novel opens with the statement, "I am an invisible man." His was not a life of recognition for individual accomplishment, but rather one of bombarding prejudices and unfulfilled expections that he was unable to surpass.

Didi Peters' personal accomplishments stand out for all to see. She, unlike the invisible man, truly gained personal recognition in her community and actually went beyond the personal level to help other minorities break longstanding stereotypes and barriers. Not only was Didi one of the first black female television producers in the country, but through her development of Maga Link, Inc., she opened the door for many blacks and other minorities to become involved in the major media avenues of our society. Maga Link, Inc., is the first institution in the Nation to train low-income minorities and women for professional careers in videotape technology. I have had the opportunity to visit Maga Link, Inc., many times, and I have been continuously impressed by the projects in this workshop. Maga Link, Inc., was recently recognized by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting System for its nationwide program development, production, and distribution.

While dance and jazz music have long been integral parts of the black community, Didi succeeded in promoting these passions in mainstream society. Of this endeavor the invisible man could only dream. Didi was a founder of the Dance Theater of Harlem Advisory Board and Guild which unquestionably has helped to promote black expression within the grand, dance expression of ballet. The Dance Theater of Harlem has enjoyed worldwide recognition for its beautiful productions. Didi initiated several other important art and dance projects including the Museum of African American Art, the Bella Lewitzky Dance Foundation, and a group called the Dance Gallory which constructed the first theater ever built for dance in the history of the art form. This is located in downtown Los Angeles.

Another organization founded by Didi, The Media Forum, received 10 Emmy awards in 1984 for its television special "Voices of Our People." Didi concentrated on refocusing the entertainment industry's attention of blacks and minorities in a more positive light.

Didi and Brock's creation of the production company, Delbro Enterprises, for instance, upholds this policy and exposes the public to quality black-oriented productions. Delbro produced such award-winning projects as the PBS–TV special "This Far By Faith," and the feature film, "Five on the Black Hand Side." The frustrated character in "The Invisible Man" could not penetrate society's tough barriers and defenses, and he had no hope for changing public misconceptions or prejudices. Didi and Brock have affected public awareness and in awareness we find understanding, which is the path to acceptance and advancement. Didi's own activities, along with her joint ventures with Brock, will remain with us for many years to come. Acceptance and understanding will be found somehow, someday, and surely Didi's actions will be a key link in the chain of understanding.

With public exposure as a recognized force, Didi became the national funding director of the NAACP in which she created the national "Bank of Stars," a year of concert tours in major cities which featured stars of music, poetry, and literature. People of all races, religions, and backgrounds can share the pleasure in these mediums. Didi's love for jazz music also inspired her to develop and produce the first all jazz radio station in the United States, WNCN in New York.

Didi received many awards and honors over the years including the NAACP National Humanitarian Image Award, the Delta Sigma Theta Fortitude Award, the honor of being named one of the Ten Most Distinguished Black Women in 1984 by the NAACP legal defense fund, and the Rosa Parks Award of the USC Black Woman's Caucus in 1982. Didi also was the recipient of many citations from mayors, Governors, State, and national legislators for her outstanding professional and community service.

I want to extend my sincere condolences to Didi's loving husband, Brock, her daughter Lise Jo Peters, her sister Marie Daniels Baxter, her cousin Albert Popwell, and a host of other relatives and friends who will deeply miss such a generous and insightful woman.

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my deepest sympathy to the family of Ms. Didi Daniels Peters, the well-known producer, publicist, and community activist who died on February 25 after an extended illness.

As one of the first black women television producers in the country, Ms. Peters made successful inroads within the public broadcasting industry, later paving the way for greater opportunities for minorities and women. As assistant publicity director for United Artists Records, she became one of the first female executives within the recording industry.

She was founder of the Dance Theatre of the Harlem Advisory Board and Guild and founding board member of the Museum of African American Art. As founder of Media Forum, Ms. Peters worked with eminent media personalities to produce seminar forums and concerts designed to inform the public about media imagemaking.

Didi's strides in media imagemaking culminated in a joint venture with her husband, Mr. Brock Peters, to build a production company, Delbro Enterprises, as a means to break the blaxploitation of stereotypical black-oriented films. The uniquely creative husband and wife team also produced numerous internationally acclaimed benefit events for the social issues and organizations to which they were both committed.

In addition, she and her husband, of Maga Link, Inc., created the Communications Bridge Institute, the first institution in the Nation to provide for the professional career training in videotape technology of low-income, minorities and women. Recently, Maga Link, Inc., was named by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting as the CPB Consortium for Black Programming to the Public Broadcasting System for the development, production, and distribution of programming to stations nationally and to PBS educational and cultural institutions.

During a recent interview, this legendary achiever was asked about that in her career of which was was most proud of. Many of us were touched by her response. She readily responded, "I am proudest of my part in creating Maga Link, Inc., which now trains over 35 percent women for behind the camera jobs and of the Dance Theatre of Harlem which destroyed the stereotypical view that blacks did not have the arch for ballet." She continued, "But I am filled with both pride and joy as I look back over the 27 year Brock and Didi partnership. There have been a lot of liberal and sensitive men who opened those first doors for me. I was lucky enough to marry one who has understood what the word partner really means."

Mr. Speaker, although Didi will be sorely missed by family and friends alike, her vivacity for life will remain with us in spirit, and as a model, for many years to come.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORSKI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

"THE SATANIC VERSES"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise with my colleagues to reaffirm the human right to free expression. The threats of death and violence issued by Ayatollah Khomeini against Salman Rushdie and those assoticiated with his book, "The Satanic Verses," are wholly unacceptable.

Salman Rushdie and his belief in intellectual questioning run an obvious collision course with the world of Islam and its defense of the Holy Scriptures and the prophet Mohammed. We recognize that his book has caused genuine offense, and we do not condone the demeaning of anyone's religious beliefs.

Nor is this protest brought simply because it was the Ayatollah who issued the threats. Such threats of assassination must be denounced no matter who the perpetrator.

Some argue it would have been better that Rushdie not write a book that is offensive to Moslems. They argue that had it been written about ideas held sacred in our own culture, it would not have been well received, let alone become a best seller. Perhaps. But that is not the question.

No one is guaranteed a good review or respectable sales; but we, and the preponderance of nations do believe that there is a fundamental guarantee of the right to disseminate your ideas, no matter how noxious, heinous, or reprehensible they may be. Ultimately, it is the power of the reader, not of the state, that must determine the legitimacy of intellectual thoughts.

The threat against Rushdie and his associates is a threat against the very freedom of expression itself. The United States, which wishes this freedom to be respected in countries throughout the world, would be hypocritical not to express its anger and opposition at the attack levied by the Ayatollah. The Senate has passed a resolution condemning the death threats. I have introduced a similar resolution in the House, which has been cosponsored by over 100 of our colleagues. I would urge again that my colleagues vote for this resolution of condemnation so that both Houses of the U.S. Congress will be on record firmly in support of our most basic freedom, the one we use every day right here, the freedom of speech.

I applaud the actions of our allies, the European Community, in withdrawing their diplomatic chiefs from Iran and for discussing economic sanctions against Iran.

I applaud the librarians and the booksellers that have resisted intimidation and continue to offer the book to their patrons.

And I applaud the many authors here and abroad that have tirelessly protested the Ayatollah's threats and come to the defense of their colleague, Mr. Rushdie.

And I offer my sympathy to the stores that have already suffered attacks, presumably related to the book. To Cody's Bookstore, a landmark in Berkeley, and to the Riverdale Press, a weekly newspaper in the Bronx that has always defended the right to speak freely.

Finally, as we condemn these death threats, we should not be naive. Khomeini is not one known to back down, particularly not when it is the United States that is doing the asking. The United States has no diplomatic or trade relations, economic or military aid—outside of some humanitarian aid—to use as leverage against Iran and the Ayatollah.

But it would be wrong not to speak out just because we thought the Ayatollah might not heed our words. Our words in this case are our principles—that we stand firmly behind the right to speak, to write, to read, to distribute information, and to freely protest the works of others. We believe in the ability of people to decide for themselves the merits of a writer's words.

We have enough experience with book burnings in its many forms to know that it has no justification whatsoever.

H.R. 1087: Mr. RAHALL.

SENATE—Wednesday, March 8, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.—Matthew 5:9.

God of peace, the western wall of the Dirksen Building reminds us that, "The Senate is the living symbol of the union of States." We accept controversy as endemic in our political system. We are grateful for the God-given freedom that made it so. But save us, Lord, from conflict that violates the law of love, breeds enmity, acrimony, divisiveness, and destroys unity of which the Senate is the symbol.

Thank Thee, Father, for strong convictions, the courage which those convictions generate and the will to exercise them.

May the words spoken here be under the control of an enlightened conscience, warm hearts infused with good will and cool heads committed to truth.

We ask Your blessing upon John Tower and his family in this difficult time.

In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning, after a period of time for the two leaders, there will be 30 minutes for routine morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. At 11:30, the Senate will go into executive session to continue debate on the nomination of former Senator Tower.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, during my closing statement on the Senate floor yesterday, I indicated to my colleagues that there could be rollcall votes during today's session. We are ready to go to a final vote on the Tower nomination as soon as the distinguished Republican leader indicates his assent to do so.

As all of my colleagues know, last Friday the distinguished Republican leader stated here in the Senate publicly that he was considering offering a motion or motions in relation to the Tower nomination. In the event such motions are made—and he is of course free to make them at any time—there may well be rollcall votes on those motions and Senators should be aware and available for such votes should they occur.

So I repeat, rollcall votes are possible during today's session and it is my expectation that today's debate will continue through the day and into the evening.

I note the distinguished Republican leader now on the floor and would merely repeat what I have stated to him privately and publicly. It is my hope that we could complete action on this matter this week. I believe that a fair and appropriate time would be to vote sometime tomorrow. I suggest that to the distinguished leader for his consideration. We are now entering the fifth full day of debate. Tomorrow will be the sixth day of debate.

At least from my standpoint, the message I am receiving from my constituents—and I do not represent this as anything other than it is—the views of my constituents are that this matter has gone on long enough; it ought to be brought to a conclusion. And, as the Constitution mandates, that conclusion is for the Senate to vote on the nomination up or down, each Senator casting his vote consistently with his or her own conscience.

So that is my hope, Mr. President, and my distinguished colleague and friend. With that, I will yield the floor.

I reserve the remainder of my time and yield to the distinguished Republican leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized under the order.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the President pro tempore and my friend, the Senator from Maine, the distinguished majority leader.

We have discussed when to vote. It is going to be a very close vote. The majority leader has indicated he thinks he has the votes. We are not certain. We do not question the majority leader.

Our effort is to do what we can to attract as many Republicans and Democrats to support the Tower nomination. Frankly, it is a bit like walking on eggshells. You want to be sure you do not offend anyone. At the same time, you have to defend not only the nominee but to support the President in this very important nomination process.

I just left from visiting with the President. We did discuss the Tower nomination. He fully supports his nominee. He said it was not just an act of loyalty or friendship. He has known John Tower in many, many rolls, including his role in the Senate, his role on the Tower Commission, and his role as an arms negotiator. He feels that he is eminently qualified and the most qualified person he could find to head that very important agency with a budget of over $300 billion.

I know the debate has been longer than it has been on most nominees, but this is unprecedented. The hearings were unprecedented. Due process, I think, means what some of us who are lawyers or have been lawyers, at least went to law school, understand it to mean: fairness, notice, right to cross-examine, impartial tribunal, a lot of things that we believe have not been accorded to John Tower, who walked this Chamber for 24 years with honor.

So we do not want to prolong the debate. We want to win, just as some on the other side want to win.

I hope there is no hostility to John Tower in this Chamber, not just because he was a former colleague, but because I think he is a well-qualified nominee.

So I certainly will work with the majority leader and, at the same time, work with my colleagues who may be undecided or, if not undecided, undeclared. And that is another distinction. Some are decided but undeclared. If those that have decided would declare it would make my job easier and certainly the job of the majority leader. Because once one or the other side has a majority—and I do not quarrel with the majority leader, it is time to vote. But as of now there seems to be a number in the undeclared category, maybe not undecided, but undeclared category.

So I will be consulting with the majority leader throughout the day and hopefully we can come to some agreement.

I believe we have a number of speakers on this side who want to discuss the merits of the nominee. I think it will be a pretty solid debate today.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the distinguished leader for his comments. It is my hope that the debate will be of the character and nature which all of us expect of the Senate and that it will be such as to enlighten all concerned. I look forward to that, as does the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both leaders reserve the balance of their times.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask to proceed as if in morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, a period for the transaction of morning business will now commence. Senators will be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The senior Senator from Nevada, Mr. REID, is recognized for 5 minutes.

(The remarks of Mr. REID pertaining to the introduction of legislation are located later in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The junior Senator from New York is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, over the past weekend, reports were published in the New York Times, the Washington Post, and other newspapers stating that the administration is ready to proceed with the FSX fighter plane codevelopment deal with Japan. Mr. President, I remain opposed to this deal. I intend to do everything in my power to see that it does not go through.

Why? Why would I oppose it? Mr. President, to put it simply, it is a bad bargain. It is neither in our national security nor economic interest. It will seriously risk the future of one of the few remaining industries in which America is preeminent—aviation, in particular as it relates to the military aspects.

The Japanese are strong and deeply valued allies, and it is clearly in our mutual interest that they bear a larger share of their defense burden, much of which is being paid for by the American taxpayers. Their interest in this deal, however, is more about increasing their already formidable economic power than their defense capabilities and their fair share. The Japanese objective is clearly to do in aviation what they have done in automobiles, electronics, and other areas of industrial production.

Mr. President, despite a $54 billion trade surplus in the United States last year, and certainly one bound to be that much this year, the Japanese refuse to purchase our lower cost, high-performance aircraft. We hear about free trade. We hear about fairness. Here is an opportunity for the Japanese to demonstrate some of that.

Mr. President, Japan could purchase F-16 fighters from the United States for about $18 million per aircraft, roughly one-third of what the pending arrangement will cost them. In other words, they can buy a plane ready to fly that will meet their needs at $18 million, but they are ready to pay almost $60 million. Why? Well, it is certainly not for defense purposes. They are interested in acquiring U.S. aviation technology to support the development of their own industrial base.

If the Japanese objectives were to upgrade their military in the most cost efficient way and to pick up a greater share of their own defense, they would buy American, they would buy the American F-16. If the Japanese objectives were to lessen friction caused by the huge imbalances in Japanese-United States trade, they would buy American.

The true objective, however, is the long-term development and promotion of their domestic aviation industry and it is shortsighted of us to assist them in their drive to surpass another American industry and to dominate another world market.

More broadly, the FSX agreement is yet another demonstration of what is wrong with our decision making process. Let us look at what has happened in the last 2 weeks. A number of Senators, including this one, voiced substantial concerns about the agreement and wrote to the President asking him to look at it again.

An interagency review was promised. A deal apparently was negotiated between the agencies and they are prepared to say, "Well, now it is OK, we will take care of it all." The problem, Mr. President, is that the Japanese have not agreed to a thing and all available evidence is that they will not change one word. We are sitting around negotiating with ourselves and we are calling it a deal.

According to the New York Times story, Japanese officials said they would not renegotiate the memorandum of understanding but American officials said protocol could be written into the agreement between General Dynamics and Mitsubishi. Japanese officials said they had "no comment" on this aspect. So once again we start by——

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the junior Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I understand that we are to return to another matter at 11:30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. D'AMATO. If those parties are ready to go, then I would ask that the remainder of my text be placed in the RECORD as if read in its entirety. If they are not, I would ask for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I do not object to giving the Senator 5 minutes. I would like to ask for unanimous consent that I be allowed no more than 2 minutes for the purpose of introducing a piece of legislation as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to an additional 5 minutes being given to the Senator from New York, Mr. D'AMATO, and 2 minutes to the senior Senator from Nebraska, Mr. EXON, with the order for the Senate going into executive session being delayed accordingly 7 minutes?

The Chair hears no objection. The junior Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. D'AMATO. I thank the chair.

So once again, Mr. President, we start by accepting the other side's negotiating position. That is simply Japan says we will not renegotiate.

A little common sense and a look at history is called for, Mr. President. Let us think back to how this issue of technology transfer was handled in the F-15 coproduction agreement. It seems that we did not want certain sensitive technology transferred as part of that program either, and we wrote a restriction into the agreement. But later the Japanese came back and said, "How can we repair these planes if we do not have the technology?" And so you know what happened? We gave them that technology. So what is to stop the same thing from happening, and I would suggest it will take place again, or as it appears Secretary Baker has received a flat "No" from the Japanese when he sought even a guarantee about the 40 percent U.S. share of subsequent FSX production. So let us see where we stand. Let us analyze.

We cut a deal to codevelop the FSX after accepting the flat Japanese refusal to buy F-16's off the shelf that can be produced at one-third of the cost of their plane. After questions are raised about the fairness of the deal, a giveaway of $7 billion in United States technology for something that would approximate between $420 million and $430 million, our share of the development phase of the program, we accept the Japanese refusal to renegotiate and go back to negotiate with ourselves.

After negotiating with ourselves, we come up with the idea of amending the draft license and technical assistance agreement, which is the company-to-company agreement implementing the order to restrict the flow of technology to the Japanese—we come up with this idea knowing it has failed in the past and obviously it is going to fail in the future.

Finally, we accept the flat refusal of the Japanese to talk to us about a guaranteed share of FSX production. Now State and Defense Departments tell us they cut the best deal they could. Mr. President, it is a bad deal. It should not go through. It is vital to our national security to proceed with this program, they say. Well, some of us think it is vital to our national security that we not proceed with this program.

This Senator, for one, has no faith that the wonderfully flexible folks in State and Defense will not give in at some later time after Congress has allowed this program to begin.

Once that happens, if you ever find out that it has happened, it is a dead issue. Then there will be some other issue on the front burner and the American people will not care and the Japanese will get advanced aerospace technology for a song.

Mr. President, I predict, if that continues, what we will see take place is a sacrificing of American jobs which should not be sacrificed because we can build that plane better, cheaper, more cost efficient, more cost effective. I say it is about time that we begin to see what is good for America, what is important for America, instead of trying to find ways to justify this incredible agreement, an agreement that in my opinion does grievous damage to America, its interest economically and particularly as it relates to technological know-how and production capacity in the future.

I predict a decade from now we will have the Defense Department saying we have got to buy this Japanese plane because they can now produce it better and cheaper than we can in the United States. I predict that the markets that we have and the surpluses as related to the sale of military aircraft in Europe—and that is one of pluses we have—will be lost to the Japanese. We will be buying Japanese planes and Japanese technology that we have helped supply with 7 billion dollars' worth of American taxpayers' money. If we cannot stand up to this issue, then I suggest to you it seems to me that things are going to get worse, trade imbalances are going to grow deeper, that we may have won the battle but it certainly appears to this Senator that we have lost the war as it relates to protecting America, the rights of people to work, and certainly our productive capacity. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. EXON, for 2 minutes.

(The remarks of Mr. EXON pertaining to the introduction of legislation are located later in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION AFFILIATION ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Senator D'AMATO and I are jointly reintroducing the Depository Institution Affiliation Act. This legislation provides for a new regulatory structure to govern our Nation's financial services industry. The Depository Institution Affiliation Act permits different financial services functions to be offered in separately capitalized subsidiaries under an umbrella holding company. It contains strong and effective safeguards to protect insured institutions, while affording all companies equal opportunities to become integrated providers of financial services.

Thus, both financial and nonfinancial organizations would be allowed to own, or be affiliated with, banks and other depository institutions. This will encourage the creation of diversified financial services companies that have the financial and managerial resources needed to inject new capital and vitality into an American industry whose preeminence has consistently been eroding over the last decade.

Under this proposal, separate subsidiaries of the holding company will have their activities regulated along functional lines without regard to ownership or affiliation. At the same time, this revitalized regulatory structure will provide adequate safeguards to insulate insured depository institutions from their nonbanking affiliates.

This insulation will not, however, prohibit cross-marketing or act to impose other artificial, anticompetitive restrictions that inhibit the synergy which would benefit the American consumer. The advantages of this type of structural reform program are significant and particularly timely. Take, for example, the present FSLIC debate. In many respects the very nature of today's FSLIC crisis is but a microcosm of the systemic problems facing our entire financial sector. Stated another way, the thrifts are the first victims of an antiquated and inefficient regulatory scheme. As we work toward what will almost certainly be the most massive Federal bailout in our history, we must also consider long-term measures that will prevent the problems from reoccurring or spreading to the commercial banking industry and the FDIC.

While it is still too early to predict the outcome of the debate, one fact should be clear. If all depository institutions, banks and thrifts alike, were given the opportunity to affiliate with any and all other firms, they would benefit from being part of a dynamic group with new and diversified sources of income and capital.

For years now, the financial industry has demonstrated that diversification lends stability to the system. And this premise has served us well. For example, savings and loans that are experiencing the greatest difficulties are not those affiliated with diversified unitary holding companies like Ford Motor Financial Services or Household International. Quite the contrary. Those in trouble are the specialists and the undercapitalized firms which serve only a narrow market segment. Whether you are talking about the thrift segment, the banking segment, the securities segment or the insurance segment, it is necessary to attract more highly capitalized, publicly oriented companies to a broadly defined financial services industry. That is the only way for financial institutions to provide a wide variety of services, enhance the capital of the system as a whole, and ensure a safe and sound financial industry. The maxim bears repeating—diversification means stability. The more diversified the parent company, the greater the strengthen of the underlying subsidiaries, and the less likely any one sector of the industry is to suffer a debilitating loss.

Of course, appropriate firewalls must be placed between depository and nondepository institutions, and they must be policed carefully. And if the depository institutions subsidiary should fall below minimum capital requirements, it should be subject to mandatory recapitalization or divestiture. This will protect depositors and the deposit insurance funds against the risk of loss. Measures such as these might prevent the FSLIC disaster from coming back to haunt us. Perhaps most importantly, structural reform will benefit consumers. The increased competition will lead to better pricing structures, a resurgence of service, and the safety and soundness consumers need in these volatile times.

It is hoped that our bill will serve as a response to section 203 of the Competitive Equality Banking Act which declares that it is the intend of the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee to conduct a comprehensive review of banking and financial laws and the need for financial restructuring legislation before the expiration of the moratorium on thrifts exiting the Federal savings and loan insurance fund. The moratorium will probably be extended because of the long-term nature of the FSLIC fund crisis that the banking committee is presently considering.

However, I think that the restructuring inherent in the FSLIC resolution proposal will set the stage for overall restructuring of the financial industry. We are at the crossroads of opportunity. We can continue to sit back and watch while the world changes without our input, or we can take control and be sure that change takes place in a rational, legal structure, that meets the policy goals we have established in light of the expanding global financial system around us.

IMPLEMENTATION OF CLEARINGHOUSE ON STATE AND LOCAL COMPETITIVENESS INITIATIVES

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am delighted to find that the Council on Competitiveness has recommended that the Bush administration "fully implement the provision of the omnibus trade bill to create a clearinghouse for State and local technology initiatives."

As my colleagues may know, the Council on Competitiveness was founded in 1986 as an outgrowth of the Young Commission. It is chaired by John A. Young, CEO of Hewlett Packard, and its membership includes leading executives from industry, organized labor, and higher education. Its overriding objective is to improve the ability of American companies and workers to compete in world markets.

The council report that endorses the clearinghouse is entitled "governing America: A competitiveness Policy Agenda for the New Administration" and it was issued earlier this year.

The report explains its recommendation as follows:

State technology programs fill a niche that the Federal Government cannot: small-scale, grassroots efforts involving local businesses, universities and governments. The clearinghouse should collect and disseminate information on State programs, develop methods to evaluate these programs and provide technical assistance and advice. At the very least, the Federal Government should make sure that its programs do not duplicate or compete with those established at the State level. (Report at page 22.)

I was the author of the provision of the trade bill that created the clearinghouse.

The clearinghouse provides us all with an opportunity to learn from the initiatives of State and local governments. They are taking the lead in fashioning a competitiveness strategy for the country. They are experimenting with new policies, new programs, and new approaches.

I have confidence that the administration will fully implement the clearinghouse and I expect to be working closely with the administration to see that this occurs.

THIRD INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ORAL REHYDRATION THERAPY [ICORT III]

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, in December of last year here in Washington, DC, over 400 people, most of them from developing countries, met under the auspices of the Agency for International Development [AID] to discuss oral rehydration therapy [ORT] and what it would take to sustain ORT programs in the 1990's. Oral rehydration therapy uses a simple solution of water, sugar, and mineral salts which quickly corrects the chemical imbalance created by diarrhea. It also involves continued breastfeeding, appropriate supplemental foods, and referral of severe cases. Diarrheal diseases currently kill an estimated 5 million children in the developing world every year, and experts at AID and the World Health Organization estimate that more than half of these deaths could be averted through the use of ORT.

Ten years ago, ORT was virtually unknown. Today, 96 developing countries have diarrheal disease control programs; approximately 60 percent of LDC populations have access to ORT; and ORT is used in almost one quarter of all cases of diarrhea. The Agency for International Development has played a major role in the promotion of this simple therapy internationally. It sponsored the first conference on ORT-ICORT I—in June 1983 to publicize information about this lifesaving therapy. In December 1985 AID sponsored ICORT II, which brought together over 1,000 health professionals to share their experiences in implementing ORT programs. And thus it was fitting, as AID began to look at development assistance programs and priorities in the 1990's, that it convened a third conference—ICORT III—to draw attention to sustainability of ORT programs in the years ahead.

From all reports, ICORT III was a remarkable success, and I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD the address which Ambassador Alan Woods, Administrator of AID, made to the participants on December 16, 1988.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLOSING ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR ALAN WOODS, ADMINISTRATOR, AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Good Morning, ladies and gentlemen—we have come to the close of a remarkable three days. I'm pleased that our discussions during this conference have been candid and creative.

We have heard some remarkable examples of program challenges and—we have solid evidence of program success.

Dr. Magda Mohamed Ali from Sudan and Dr. Mkerenga from Tanzania told us about important work that is being done of health worker training.

Dr. Mota and Dr. Gabr shared with us their experiences in Mexico and Egypt—where they achieved successful collaboration between the government and the private sector.

Dr. Ahmed—reflecting on Pakistan's experience—reminded us of the importance of marketing and communications. Speaking broadly—Dr. Bengston warned us of three formidable obstacles to sustainability: Ignorance, Prejudice, Poverty.

Over the past three days we have heard oral rehydration therapy described as everything—from a "ten cent cure"—to a "social movement."

But what is more important—we have heard of dramatic successes—in Egypt—Indonesia—Malawi—Haiti—and elsewhere.

That success is measured in terms of:

Increasing knowledge and use of oral rehydration therapy;

Fewer hospitalizations for dehydration;

Lower costs for government programs—and,

Lower family health expenditures.

Most important—success means that more children will be saved.

We have also heard some very practical recommendations:

First—bring oral rehydration therapy into the hospitals: We will see pay-off in the way mothers and medical professionals view ORT—and in reduced medical care costs.

Second—work through existing communications and distribution channels—even informal and traditional channels—where this is the best way of reaching people;

Next—at every step of the way—maximize, self-reliance—on the part of the mother—the family—and the community; and

Finally—we must build bridges to other elements of the society and economy—do not ignore the role that educational, religious, and commercial organizations can play.

Ladies and gentlemen—we know oral rehydration therapy works. It is a simple, cost-effective, life-saving therapy.

I strongly agree with Dr. Bengston's observation—that the control of diarrheal diseases is not only a major objective in its own right—but also a means to revitalize—strengthen—and energize the entire health system.

Let me repeat his observation that: "We have taken the opportunity to do battle against diarrhea as also an opportunity to combat inefficiency, laziness, corruption, and a host of problems not unique to the health sector—but particularly dangerous because of the human lives that are involved."

Oral rehydration therapy works. Yet, the more we have learned, the more we have appreciated the complexity of the problem that sustainability poses for all of us.

There are, indeed, challenges to sustainability.

Sustainability requires commitment, patience, and time: Time to plan, time to influence health behavior, time to reach beyond the public health infrastructure to encourage a much more active role for private service providers.

Unfortunately, time is not necessarily on our side. In countries that are failing economically, the situation is going to get worse—no matter how many campaigns we mount to combat specific diseases.

If we look beyond the year 2000—we see demographic trends that will magnify every health problem developing countries face.

The world's population continues to explode.

We are now five billion strong, and we are growing exponentially.

Most of the growth is coming from the developing world: Where basic systems—such as health, education, and water—are already strained to the limit.

Finding sustainable solutions to health care problems is the central challenge we face as we move forward.

We need to examine what steps can be taken by families and by private businesses in developing countries to address health care needs.

Now I don't want to suggest that there is no role for ministries of health and public health care providers—because there certainly is.

But if we focus only on what the public sector can do to improve health standards in developing countries, we will not succeed.

I believe that if we want health care improvements in developing countries to become permanent, we need to focus on several things:

First, general economic growth—the creation of the domestic means to finance health care services.

Second, more pluralistic health care systems. Countries need to strive for a better balance between private care and government programs.

Third, families must be encouraged to become more involved in their own health care.

We know that even the poorest households are spending some money on health care.

In fact, the resources families spend are already much greater than public expenditures on health.

We need to think about how we might help families get more for the money they spend on health care.

So—we must recognize that health programs have to wear a new face in the 1990s. They must reflect rapidly changing economic, political, and demographic trends.

We must be prepared to learn, and to change. New problems arise, as do new opportunities.

The family itself is changing. More mothers are working outside the home.

Older girls who traditionally helped their mothers with child care and household chores are now in school. We need more of this.

Isolated rural households now have access to radio and in many cases television—and they know that life can be different for them and their children.

The world is changing—but it seems to me that what must be preserved at all costs is the ability of a family to act in its own self-interest. There is ample evidence that where health services, schools, and jobs are available, families will make extraordinary sacrifices to take advantage of these opportunities.

It is fair to say we've only begun to tap the potential of oral rehydration therapy.

ORT represents a life-saving therapy;

ORT is a method that has energized a wide range of institutions—both public and private—in the fight for better child health, and

ORT is a program that has paved the way for the introduction of new health technologies.

Thus, it is an extremely cost-effective child health technology. It is also a model that opens the door to new approaches to child health.

We share an ambitious goal—to make oral rehydration therapy and immunizations available to virtually every child in the countries where we work.

We share a similar determination—that children should not die from dehydration or from diseases that could easily be prevented.

Finally, we share a high regard for human life. As parents—we believe that every child born into this world deserves the chance to live without pain and suffering.

In 1985 we set important goals for ourselves. And there is ample evidence that these goals are now being achieved. We will not abandon our commitment.

With that in mind, let's take this opportunity to rededicate ourselves to our child survival goals.

We must work to maintain our enthusiasm and concern—while planning for the future.

We must work to sustain—and add to—the remarkable accomplishments we have achieved to date.

We must use the methods we now have—recognizing that new tools will be needed as well.

I believe this investment will pay off: For countries, for communities, for families, and most important of all—for children—they are our future.

Thank you.

WILLIAM E. JACKSON

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, at one point in the course of the Tower nomination proceedings, the reliability of William E. Jackson—a senior fellow at the Fulbright Institute at the University of Arkansas—was called into question by a Senator.

I have known Bill Jackson for 15 years, 3 of which he served as a senior legislative aide and foreign policy expert on my staff.

I want to state for the record that I have always found Mr. Jackson to be a most knowledgeable person, and a man of truthfulness and integrity.

I doubt that he would ever deliberately mislead or misinform a Senate committee.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Are we on the Tower nomination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are to begin, yes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session to resume consideration of the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of John Goodwin Tower, of Texas, to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I just take a minute at this time to again indicate, as I did in my earlier remarks, that this is going to be a very close vote. On this side, we want to make certain we do not offend anybody on the other side who has not yet decided. There is a difference between undecided and undeclared because I still believe the nomination will be confirmed and should be confirmed. But I would ask the question as I did yesterday—I happened to watch NBC News do a little hatchet job on John Tower last night. They had all the information about this latest strike force that went down to Texas.

But the minority does not have the information yet. NBC was able to get it but we are not able to get it. This is the PSI Subcommittee staff. Nobody else has the information. How did NBC get it? It is not available to the Republicans. It is not available to John Tower. It is not fair. We hear last night on a major network all this story about some stewardess and some other thing that nobody knows anything about except the people who investigated it, and the PSI Subcommittee, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

We have been saying from the start this is a question of fairness. I think if we are looking at things from certain people, people ought to say, go back and have more hearings. We ought to have more witnesses—along with this bad stuff that is coming. That is apparently OK.

I would just again make the plea. Let us treat John Tower fairly. What is wrong with John Tower? Why all the hostility toward John Tower? What has he done to deserve it except serve in this body with honor for 24 years? Twenty-four years is a long time.

He served on the Tower Commission with honor. He was arms negotiator with honor. He is smart, and was one smart Senator when he was here. He is a good arms negotiator, and would be a good Secretary of Defense. But every time he makes a step forward, there is another leak out there and people start talking about new allegations. Then they go on to tell you about them. They have not told us about them. They have not told John Tower about it. They have not told the White House about them. They tell NBC about them.

Maybe that is the way it has to be. But I have to believe there are enough fairminded men and women in this Chamber, and will continue to be long after this debate on both sides, who are going to say that is not fair to start leaking new allegations that have not even been made available to Members of the Senate, with no chance for cross-examination, anybody's motives, there they are right out in public, right out in print. I must say I do not know how you stop it. Due process is important—fairness, right to cross-examine, impartial tribunal, all the things that make up due process I think ought to be accorded to the nominee. It is not a trial. It was not supposed to be a trial. But it has sort of been a trial by leak and innuendo. I think we have had enough.

But I would say, as I said to the majority leader, we want to vote. We are not delaying the vote. That was also part of the NBC's coverage—the Republicans delaying the vote. We are not delaying the vote. We have to overcome all of these leaks that are going out early on, garbage after garbage dumped on John Tower. It takes a while for the American people to understand that this man has not been treated fairly. The fact that he was a former Senator does not mean that he ought to be treated any differently. He ought to be treated fairly.

So I hope we can vote this week. We are not delaying for any reason. We want to convince, yes, Senators and change the minds of the American people. We want to do what we can to make certain that the President has a right to nominate and determine the fitness and competency of nominees. I think that is what the Founding Fathers had in mind. Never in history has a President been turned down on a nominee at this stage of his Presidency.

Has anybody risen to this floor and said Senator Tower is incompetent, John Tower does not understand defense, John Tower does not understand the Senate or the Congress, or understand the budget? No. Not one. It has all been these tangential issues that somebody read a report somewhere and it said he was drinking excessively. He said it himself in the early seventies.

Someone said he made too much money or he is too tied to defense contractors. I put in the RECORD last night what he made in 2 years. One year he made $100,000, less than Senators make when they add up their honoraria. Last year he made $160,000. It was not just John Tower. It was Tower & Associates.

So I just suggest that we are going to continue to debate this nomination, hopefully at a high level. We are going to correct the record wherever we need to correct the record. We are not going to let anybody on either side trample on the rights of John Tower, and we are not going to let them trample on the rights of anyone else—not let someone stand up and read some outlandish conclusion. I think that is an obligation we all have.

So we are going to continue the debate. I must say there have not been many delays, and there have not been many quorum calls. It has been solid debate. We are prepared today, as I understand, with a number of speakers, I am advised by the ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee. So we will be trying to meet the majority leader's wish, and stay in this evening. If we can figure out a way to vote tomorrow, we will do it. We are not trying to prolong it. But we are trying to make certain that when the verdict is in, whatever the verdict is, at least the American people will say he was treated with some fairness, someone stood up for his rights, others trampled them, but some stood up for his rights. That is what is important—not John Tower's rights necessarily, but the next nominee or the next nominee or 10 years from now or 20 years from now. Maybe it will be a Democrat and maybe a Republican. Then those of us who stood up here and defended John Tower are going to have to stand up and defend that person for the same reasons, if the same reasons are applicable then.

So I hope we will have a good discussion of John Tower's merits on this side as to why he should be the Defense Secretary. Is he qualified? Does he understand? I think if we can focus on that for a while instead of on who can make the most extreme statement, then we might get this debate back into focus. That is our responsibility. George Bush is a Republican. So we have a special responsibility to keep this debate at a high level. If we veer from that, I am sure someone on the other side will call us to task.

We are prepared at the majority leader's request to debate it today. I told him I would be in touch with him later today or tomorrow, as soon as I can find out when we can vote so Members can be here. It probably will not be Friday. So it cannot be tomorrow. It will be next week. But I know Members on both sides who cannot be here Friday, not that they do not want to be. We have one with a death in the family on this side who cannot be here on Friday, and I am certain there may be other constraints on the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in his remarks, the distinguished Republican leader alluded to establishing a precedent for the future with respect to this nomination. That, of course, raises a question of the past. There appeared today in the Washington Post an interesting article entitled "How Tower Used His No Vote," which recounted the record of Senator Tower in opposing many nominees of the other Presidents.

We have been told repeatedly in the debate here by Senator Tower's supporters that he should be approved because the President should have his own man. The distinguished Republican leader said over and over again the President won the last election, and therefore he is entitled to have his own man. But if one views the record and looks at Senator Tower's own record on nominees, one can only conclude that his supporters now want the Senate to apply to Senator Tower's nomination a standard different from that which Senator Tower himself applied to Presidential nominees when he was a Senator.

He voted against Paul Warnke to be head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. He voted against Ray Marshall to be Secretary of Labor. He voted against William Usury to be Secretary of Labor. He voted against Paul Nitze to be Secretary of the Navy. In every one of those instances, he did so simply because he disagreed with some of their policy positions. He did not challenge their suitability. He did not challenge their experience. He did not challenge their ability. He did not challenge their effectiveness. He simply said he disagreed with their views, and, therefore, he was voting against them, a position far more extreme as to the relative powers of the Senate and the President than any opponent of Senator Tower has advocated in this debate.

Many of the statements we have heard here by Senator Tower's proponents sparked my interest in the views of some of these Senators when the President was a Democrat and the nominee was a Democrat. If any Senator would like to engage in some interesting reading of history, he or she ought to go back and take the statements made in 1977 when President Carter sent Cabinet nominations up to the Hill and contrast them with the statements being made during this debate by the very same Senators.

Every one of us, if we stay in the Senate long enough and make enough speeches, will inevitably contradict ourselves. We will meet ourselves coming around the corner on some issue. But nowhere have I seen a more dramatic reversal in position than the statements made by many of the Republican Members of the Senate in 1977, when they were considering the nomination of a Democratic President, when they were telling us how expansive the powers of the Senate were, how Senators ought to vote against nominees simply for disagreeing with them on a policy position.

There was no talk then about the President having his own way. There was no talk then about the President winning the last election. There was no talk then about the future of the confirmation process. There was no talk then about the fairness of the process. Over and over again, Republican Senators, many of whom are still in the Senate, many of whom have made speeches this past week, saying the President ought to have his own way, and we are somehow threatening the future of the presidency by not confirming this nomination, took exactly the opposite position when the President was a Democrat and the nominee was a Democrat.

Indeed, if one were looking to compile an analysis of the opposing points of view on the proper constitutional powers of the Senate in confirmation, one need only compile the speeches of Republican Senators in 1977, put them on one side of the page, and then take the speeches by the very same Senators in 1989 and put them on the other side of the page. You would have exactly opposite arguments on what are the proper roles of the President and the Senate in the confirmation process.

Mr. President, I am having these statements compiled and will be placing them in the RECORD later for the ready reference of all Senators. It will not take very long for the Senators on the other side to conduct similar research and find that the same thing is true of many Democratic Senators.

I am going to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island in just a moment, because I know he has a tight schedule; but I will just close this moment by making the point that I wanted to make. Let us refrain from self-righteousness. Let us refrain from dire predictions about the future of the Presidency and relations between the President and Congress. Let us not inflate the importance of our own words and views. Let us all recognize, as I said earlier, that if we stay here long enough and make enough speeches, we are going to find ourselves on opposite sides of the same issue.

On this one, Mr. President, many of my colleagues on the Republican side have made the most dramatic reversals of positions imaginable on this issue, and I predict to them that if and when there ever again is a Democratic President, a proposition of which there is much doubt among many people, they will be back on the other side of the issue, where they were in 1977. Do not get too locked into your present views; you may be holding another one very soon.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the distinguished leader yield to accept one question, a brief question?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the Senator.

As we look at these windows of history, depending on whether there is a Democrat or a Republican in the White House, indeed we can come up with statistics as the majority leader represents, but let us take the big window, 200 years in which we have had 540—I will correct the record to be exact—nominations by a President for members to serve in the Cabinet. Yet, only eight have been rejected by the U.S. Senate. What is it about this case that elevates or lowers it, whichever way one wishes to go, to the category that he would be the ninth?

Mr. MITCHELL. The case against is stronger than the case against was when you opposed Democratic nominees.

I thank the Senator, and yield the floor to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. PELL. I thank the majority leader for his courtesy.

Mr. President, the decision on the nomination of Senator Tower is a very difficult one for me because the arguments pro and con are so evenly balanced.

On the one hand, he is the choice of our President, and he is unquestionably competent and highly experienced in matters of defense and arms control.

On the other hand, however, his relationship with the defense industry has clearly compromised his position and reflected adversely on his judgment; not only has he realized substantial personal gain on the basis of his prior Government service, but he has established business connections with such a broad range of defense contractors, that it would be difficult for him to perform as Secretary without at least an appearance of conflict of interest.

I also fear that the fallout of protracted debate over this and other problems would deprive Senator Tower, were he to become Secretary of Defense, of the respect and regard that the men and women of our armed services should accord to that office.

I very much regret that this debate has become so partisan in nature. While I fully honor the desire of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle to support their President's nomination, I do feel that many of us on this side have genuine doubts on the matter that should transcend any considerations of partisanship.

In this regard, I take note of the restraint and sensitivity with which Senator NUNN has comported himself as has the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, and indeed as has the President, our President, I would add, of all of us.

On balance, while I would normally vote for the President's choice, particularly when that individual is an old colleague and friend, in this case I do believe it is in our Nation's best interest for the President to make another choice and should the nomination come to a vote, it is my intention to vote "no."

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting Republican leader.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I wonder if our distinguished colleague would stand for just a question. I have had the privilege for a decade here now of serving with the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. We have made many trips together and we have debated the history of this institution. We have covered many subjects together.

But was I correct in taking a note down in the Senator's opening comment he felt that the pros and cons of this case were evenly balanced? Was I correct in that note?

Mr. PELL. I hope the Senator was not. What I meant to say was it was so evenly balanced.

Mr. WARNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. PELL. It was so evenly balanced.

Mr. WARNER. Depict the scales there.

Mr. PELL. Depict them like this and on balance I think I come out negatively.

Mr. WARNER. I judged that from the Senator's conclusion but the question——

Mr. PELL. It was to keep you guessing.

Mr. WARNER. The question that I would ask my distinguished colleague is, if history reflects that only eight times this institution has seen fit to veto the judgment of a President of the United States over the course of these 200 years, I think you can infer from that that it takes just more than a degree or two off the scales, but indeed it has a heavy burden, a heavy burden of factual evidence, and yet as I listened to my distinguished colleague, I heard the refrain it was evenly balanced.

Mr. PELL. So evenly balanced.

Mr. WARNER. That even strengthens my case. It was so evenly balanced.

Wherein was that burden that took the scales down to that level to equate this case to become No. 9 in the history of the United States?

Mr. PELL. My recollection is I voted in the past once, maybe twice, against nominees for the Cabinet and, as I said, on balance, and with an inadequate computer, which is my mind, I come out against the nomination.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARNER. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. PELL. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. The fact that it has only been eight or nine times is not for lack of trying by Republicans during Democratic administrations to defeat Democratic nominees. You were not successful but you tried very hard.

So, that is the central issue in this debate. It is not the result. It is the effort. It is the standard that was applied by the very same people who are today saying the President should have his way but who when the President was a Democrat said the President should not have his way even if the nominee is qualified, even if the nominee is experienced, even if the nominee is capable just because we disagree with one of his positions.

So, the central issue is not the result. It is the effort that was made and the standard that was applied by the very people who are today applying exactly the opposite standard. That is the central question.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, at a later time I will respond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. I yield.

Mr. WARNER. At a later time I will respond to the majority leader because I have taken up more than my allocation of time. But I shall come back with a body of statistics, because he is here saying it is just a political decision at this point which troubles me greatly, if we simply recite times when the Republican side simply went after the Democratic President and his choice.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. The Senator misunderstands me. I said exactly the opposite in my remarks here. I said that it would be very easy and take but a short time for the Senator from Virginia or any other Republican Senator to go back and research the record on this side and find many Democrats whose views have undergone an identical although reverse transformation, and I do not dispute that for a moment, and I am certain that you can find that.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the majority leader.

We will do that research.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I hope the majority leader will remain on the floor to carry forward on the discussion that he initiated for a few moments.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a whole line of people waiting in my office. I will be back on the floor in a while and I will be glad to engage in any discussion with the Senator from Pennsylvania at that time.

Mr. SPECTER. I understand the majority leader has a busy schedule.

I raise two distinctions with what the Senator from Maine has contended here.

It is not really a matter of what individual Senators may say as they seek to advance their particular cause but it is really the judgment of the Senate which is critical, and the judgment of the Senate is embodied in the fact that on only eight occasions in the history of this country has the President's choice for an executive branch subordinate official have been rejected.

As the Senator from Maine, the distinguished majority leader, has pointed out, you can find statements of principle on both sides as it may be argued on one occasion by Republicans that the President ought to have great latitude in selecting his Cabinet officers and denied by the Democrats and then the shoe may be on the other foot in 1977 as the majority leader has argued.

But the critical aspect I submit is not what individual Senators argue as they may want to advance their own particular cause at a particular point in time but rather it is the judgment of the Senate which has been articulated in the conclusion that on only eight occasions we have come to the result that the President's nominee for a Cabinet officer has been rejected.

So you may have a partisan point of view or a specific point of view by a Democrat or a Republican on one occasion or another.

But it is not those views that establish the precedents. The precedents are established by what the Senate has done, and on all of the occasions when Senators have risen, including Senator John Tower, to oppose a nominee, when Senator Tower rises to oppose the nomination of a variety of individuals, and on some of those I would candidly disagree with him as he did on Mr. Nitze, for example, but it is not what John Tower, the Senator, did which is the precedent which the Senate ought to follow; it is what the Senate has done.

I would make one additional very important distinction from the generalizations of the majority leader to the facts of this case because so many of the Senators on the other side of the aisle who now oppose Senator Tower have been specific in their praise of Senator Tower, and I am sorry that Senator PELL had to leave the floor, and I know everybody has busy schedules, because I would have welcomed an opportunity for Senator PELL to have dealt with his previous evaluation of Senator Tower.

Back in 1984, on October 11, there were quite a number of comments made by Senators near the occasion of Senator Tower's retirement, and it may be that Senators were somewhat more profuse in their congratulatory message on that particular occasion. But however that may be, the fact is that Senators did speak about this man.

Senator PELL has come back to the floor. If I may have his attention, I was just about to make a reference to a comment which he had made about Senator Tower in the past. I do not pose this in the form of a question, but it may be that the Senator would care to make some response, and if so, I will be glad to yield for him to do so.

I had said that, in commenting on the argument made by the majority leader, I thought there were two sharp distinctions from his contention. One was that it was not what individual Senators had said which may differ from one occasion to another, depending on what result they seek to achieve, but rather it is the judgment of the Senate which on only eight occasions in the history of our country rejected a President's choice for a Cabinet appointment.

And then the second major distinction which I cited was the fact that as to this nominee, aside from the generalizations as to what range of discretion the President ought to have, quite a number of Senators had been effusive in their praise of John Tower which made this case very different. I was about to quote a comment which Senator PELL had made as it appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on October 11, 1984, to the following effect:

> It has been my pleasure to know John personally since he came to this body in a special election in the spring of 1961 just a few months after my first election to the Senate.

I might interject here that I think Senator PELL has had the opportunity to know more about Senator Tower than perhaps virtually anyone in the Senate today, perhaps with the exception of Senator BYRD, maybe Senator THURMOND, and perhaps a few others.

Then Senator PELL's comment goes on to this effect:

> I have always been profoundly impressed by his knowledge of government and the way he approaches all the problems with a keen analytical mind. In his four terms here, he has won the respect and admiration of all who have served with him.

Now, as I said before, it may be that there is some greater occasion for complimentary statements, but that is a forceful statement, that is a strong statement in support of this man, which I think suggests that the generalizations on the President's latitude that the majority leader had cited do not really quite fit this case where so many people have spoken so forcefully in support of Senator Tower.

I note my colleague looking at his watch. If he would care to make a comment, I would be glad to yield to him for that purpose provided that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. The Senator is right. Senator Tower and I were friends over a period of many years. In fact, early in his time as a Senator, he came up and visited me once in Rhode Island. When I made the remarks that you mentioned, it was just as he was winding up his tour of duty in the Senate before he had moved into the Defense Department matrix, which really is one of the principal reasons, as I mentioned and said in my statement. One of the principal reasons why I found myself coming out opposed to him is the, to my mind, the lack of judgment or taste or whatever you want to call it where he moved into the defense industry and then moved back. And I think that revolving door was carried a bit to an extreme.

I must agree with you that the main advantage he has in the imperfect computer that is my mind is the fact that the President nominated him, his choice. But I also recall voting at least once before against another Cabinet choice of the President's and I think you have to weigh what is the greater good of our Nation, more than any other single consideration. That is why it is pretty evenly balanced, but I had to come or did come out negatively.

I thank the Senator for this imposition.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Senator for his comment. Just by way of a very brief reply, I had made a compilation of some 100 Senators who have left this Chamber in recent times. And they have gone to a variety of professions, but they were all seeking to utilize skills which they have acquired during the course of their tenure in the Senate.

There has been great concern expressed about how much money John Tower earned as a consultant. Senator DOLE, I think, has corrected the record by pointing out that, after expenses and after associates, it was really not so much. As he said on the floor earlier today, about $100,000 then.

I recall when our distinguished colleague, Senator Baker, the majority leader, left the Senate at exactly the same time that Senator Tower left the Senate. Senator Baker was reported to have earned in excess of $800,000 in the first year that he left. And there must have been skills which he learned in this body. Other Senators have gone to law firms, other Senators have undertaken a variety of activities. So that it seems to this Senator that there is nothing so unusual when Senator Tower becomes a defense consultant.

The issue is not really what he did by way of using his specific talents, but the issue is: Did he do anything wrong? Did he divulge classified information? Did he violate any law? Did he violate any ethical rules? Did he violate any code? And the record is plain, as conceded by the majority report, that Senator Tower did nothing improper. But they only come down on the issue of the appearance of impropriety.

I would say that when you talk about appearances that is really a retreat position when there are no facts to criticize a person on. And that it is really fundamentally unfair to have a shifting standard for confirmation which is tailored especially to John Tower.

The Armed Services Committee has articulated a new standard which has never been applied before to any other nominee. There has been extensive comment about the uniqueness, or peculiarity, or some have said unfairness, in structuring a new standard for John Tower. Why should John Tower be gauged by a standard which has not been applied in the past? There are rules, there are laws, there are ethical standards. No one can point to a single violation by John Tower of any of those rules. The majority report quotes extensively from questioning by Senator LEVIN and it comes down to the conclusion only on the question of appearance, not as to anything specifically having been done wrong.

When you talk about the role that Senator Tower played on the strategic arms reduction talks, it seems to this Senator, having participated in the events at Geneva and having participated on the Intelligence Committee on the ratification of the INF, that there is really precious little that John Tower could say, even if he wanted to. And I think that we know John Tower well enough to know that he would not disclose confidential information. The committee report concluded that he had not.

But the strategic arms reduction talks were very much in midstream. They could not be concluded because of the very difficult issues of verification. Those issues still confront the strategic arms reduction talks. They could not achieve significant progress until there was some resolution of the issue of defense in space and what would happen with the Strategic Defense Initiative.

At the time that John Tower was a negotiator in Geneva, President Reagan was very forcefully pursuing the strategic defense initiative. So that until that was cleared up the Soviets were not about to make concessions on strategic arms reduction and that whole negotiation was in a state of flux. So that there is a strong reason to conclude that there was not anything special that John Tower had to impart to the people with whom he consulted.

But, Mr. President, it seems to this Senator, as a matter of basic fairness, if he did something wrong he ought to be out. But if he did something wrong, it ought to be proved. And this Armed Services Committee report does not assert any wrongful conduct on the part of John Tower, only the appearance of wrongful conduct.

Mr. President, returning for just a moment or two—and I see my colleague, Senator WILSON, has come to the floor so I shall speak at much greater length—but returning for just a moment to the distinction that I had raised with the majority leader on why this matter differs from the generalizations that he was articulating, it is because so many Senators have spoken so forcefully about Senator Tower's qualifications.

I had a brief exchange yesterday with Senator DECONCINI on the floor. Senator DECONCINI had made some comments in 1984, and I am not going to pursue those at this time. I am going to await an occasion when Senator DECONCINI is on the floor and pursue that subject.

There have been very forceful statements made by quite a number of Senators and I think it most appropriate to wait until those Senators are on the floor before going into them in any detail. I do welcome an opportunity to pursue this discussion with the majority leader when he has occasion to return to the floor later today.

Perhaps it might be appropriate, if I could attract the attention of Senator EXON on this subject, because he is on the floor, to refer to the comments which Senator EXON had made. And I am not asking for any response, but perhaps the distinguished Senator from Nebraska would care to make a response in the context of my argument that this case is different from the generalizations asserted by the majority leader.

Senator EXON made the following statement, Mr. President, on October 10, 1984, and again it is in the context of Senator Tower's departure, so it ought to be fairly evaluated in that specific context, perhaps more effusive praise than otherwise might be in order. But this is what Senator EXON is reported to have said, quoting page S13996 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

While there have been times when he and I disagreed on some specific issues as we worked toward our mutual goal of insuring a strong national defense. I have always found Senator Tower to be an admirable colleague. As the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, he has been extremely effective in insuring a proper and comprehensive addressal of those critical issues related to our Nation's security. His knowledge of defense issues is impressive and has been instrumental to the continuing influence and effectiveness of the Armed Services Committee. Senator Tower's ability to comprehend and relate so many complex issues is a rare and admirable skill. Displaying firm but fair leadership, he has guided the committee through many difficult times and has always striven to act in the best interests of our great Nation.

Mr. President, I would submit that Senator EXON's statement comes to grips with Senator Tower's integrity, where Senator EXON refers to Senator Tower's efforts to strive "to act in the best interests of our great Nation," and that his comments go to Senator Tower's overall ability to perform the job. And that, in the context of this discussion where so many Senators—Senator GLENN and Senator GORE and Senator NUNN and Senator BYRD and Senator DECONCINI and Senator KENNEDY and Senator BINGAMAN, Senator PELL, and Senator INOUYE—have all spoken out in glowing terms of Senator Tower, and that these facts sharply distinguished this confirmation proceeding from any other, on the generalizations which the majority leader had articulated.

I note my colleague from Nebraska has risen. I would be glad to yield to him if he would care to make a comment at this time if I may do so, Mr. President, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. I thank my colleague and friend from Pennsylvania. I would simply say, Mr. President, that the conclusion that the Senator from Pennsylvania has reached by searching the file on my comments about Senator Tower, which are accurate—but the conclusion that he reaches from those statements is just as erroneous as his pronunciation of my name. We served together for better than 10 years here, Senator SPECTER and myself.

So, Senator SPECTER, I just simply say that you were incorrect in your assumption. I think the question can be very simply answered. Everything that I said about John Tower at that time was absolutely accurate from what I knew. And I think probably from what I know now about John Tower, I would not have changed, essentially, what I said at that time. Although, I reserve the right to read what I said.

What you are doing is not serving the cause that you espouse. I have said on repeated occasions that when we began the confirmation process, as the second-ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee I fully intended to support John Tower because of my previous knowledge of him. I have had no question about his knowledge of the subjects of national defense. I have had no question whatsoever about his dedication to providing an adequate national defense. I consider him one of the experts in that area.

But when I began taking part in those proceedings, while I fully intended to support the nominee, the confirmation process worked. I came to the conclusion, after hearing all of the witnesses and reviewing the FBI report, that I could not in good conscience support this nominee.

There were things that significantly happened after the time that the statement that I made which has been cited by the Senator from Pennsylvania; things that happened and things that John Tower did that I feel now makes him not qualified for this position. I thank my friend for interrupting his remarks to give me a chance to respond. I would just conclude with a reference to the statement that the Senator from Pennsylvania made a few moments ago:

This FBI report contains no reports of wrongful conduct on the part of Senator Tower.

That is what I believe I heard the Senator from Pennsylvania say. If he means to say that, then he had not studied the report or else he comes to a significantly different conclusion than I have. I would simply say that I think making statements like that on the floor of the Senate does not contribute——

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. EXON. May I finish my statement? I would simply say I do not think that contributes much.

Once again I would appeal to the President of the United States, since there is so much question today on what that report contains, that the President of the United States who is the only entity who can release that report, do so and we will let the others make the decision.

I thank my friend for his giving me a chance to respond.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. I do not object to the comments of my colleague from California as long as I do not lose my right to the floor and as long as Senator EXON does not leave the floor.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I object to that because we have tried to work back and forth on this. As soon as Senator SPECTER has finished, and he has the floor, I know that my colleague from California has been waiting. I would object to anyone getting into the debate further at this time.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, where the Senator from Nebraska makes the comment that I had said that the FBI report does not contain any evidence of wrongful conduct on the part of Senator Tower, I did not say that. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Nebraska? I believe I now have the attention of the Senator from Nebraska.

The Senator from Nebraska said that I said the FBI report contained no evidence of wrongful conduct on the part of Senator Tower. I did not say that.

What I said was in discussing the issue of Senator Tower's activities as a consultant to the defense industry, that the Armed Services Committee report did not say that Senator Tower was guilty of any wrongful conduct. But the Armed Services report had in fact said that he had not divulged confidential information and the Armed Services Committee based its conclusion on appearances as opposed to any conclusion that there was any misconduct on the part of Senator Tower.

I do not use the term "FBI report" because there is no FBI report. What there is is an FBI file. I hope, and I join the Senator from Nebraska in urging, that we will have some form of a limited waiver so that we can get into the facts of the FBI file.

If, as, and when that occurs, it is the judgment of this Senator, having read the FBI file closely, that I could make the statement erroneously attributed to me by the Senator from Nebraska that the FBI file contains no evidence of wrongful conduct on the part of John Tower.

I label that as a conclusion, my conclusion, after having read the FBI file. And this Senator is convinced that, if we get down to the fine print and to the details and confront the allegations in the FBI file, that the opposition will crumble.

We have a curious rule at work in this body that we are permitted to comment on the Senate floor about what has been in the media, but we are not permitted to comment on the Senate floor as to what is in the FBI file.

There are three instances which have come to the attention of Senators on the floor which have been reprinted in the media. One involves the so-called Russian ballerina incident which totally disintegrated, total fiction, once it was subjected to analysis. The charges made by the Arizona businessman about seeing Senator Tower at the Jefferson Hotel totally disintegrated in the face of documentary evidence that Senator Tower was not there on the occassions when the Arizona businessman was at the Jefferson Hotel. On one occasion, Senator Tower was in Pakistan. On one occasion, he was in Seattle, and on a third occasion he was on a plane enroute to Dallas. Then the celebrated case of Sergeant Jackson where those allegations have been totally disintegrated.

Mr. President, I hope we come to the time when we get down to the fine print and concern ourselves with the facts as opposed to a Senator's particular form of pronunciation which might have some greater relevancy to the issue before this body.

But I, for one, believe that the comments by the Senator from Nebraska in evaluating John Tower on October 10, 1984, before it became a partisan issue, have great strength in the ultimate conclusion here, when the Senator from Nebraska referred to Senator Tower as being extremely effective, when the Senator from Nebraska referred to Senator Tower's "ability to comprehend and relate to so many complex issues is a rare and admirable skill."

Before this matter became a partisan issue, there were many Senators, and I hope to have an opportunity to discuss with each of these Senators when they are on the floor—Senator GLENN, Senator GORE, Senator BYRD, Senator DECONCINI, Senator KENNEDY, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator INOUYE—the statements which they have made in praising Senator Tower as a man of great capability.

I think these statements, Mr. President, aside from what we all know to be true—well, let me retract from what we all know to be true. That is subject to varying interpretations. These statements made by these colleagues of Senator Tower make the case very different than the generalization of the majority leader, and I hope to have an opportunity to discuss that with him later today when he returns to the floor. I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I will vote against John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. That statement should really suffice without my going into further detail on the Senate floor. My reasons are much the same as those already presented in considerable detail by many Senators who have preceded me.

I visited S-407, I have studied the documents, I followed the debate with care. My repeating the case against Tower at this late stage could only further inflame an already overheated and damaging controversy, a controversy replete with personal incriminations and attacks on the Senate itself. It is really time to call a halt.

The odds are heavily against John Tower's confirmation. I see no rational purpose in prolonging the agony in the remote hope that enough votes might be changed so John Tower could squeak by a single vote, especially if it turns out to be a single vote margin and nothing more and that single vote is cast by the Vice President, who himself is not a Senator.

Imposing a Secretary of Defense on an unwilling Senate and a skeptical nation could be a very serious mistake. John Tower is a sorely wounded nominee. Wounded, I would point out, by his own hand. At best, he would go into office, if confirmed, too weak to carry the heavy burden that a Secretary of Defense must shoulder. He would not bring to the office the stature and respect someone should have who is to assume duties and responsibilities second only to the President of the United States in the military chain of command. Who can foresee the damage, I ask, to the Nation this could bring about? Surely it could, and I believe would, harm our national defense.

The people have just elected a new President who deserves to get off to a good start. I am not a member of the President's party, but for the sake of the Nation, I wish him well. I can attest that this is also the feeling of other Senate Democrats. I am quite confident it is the feeling of all Senate Democrats.

Two Democrats have announced their support for Tower. This should dispel charges of party line partisanship directed toward this side of the aisle. By contrast, not a single Republican has broken ranks and announced opposition to Tower. Where is a Republican willing to exercise judgment, talk about partisanship, talk about discipline? This is a fight thrust upon us by a nomination that never should have been made or, once made, should have been withdrawn before now.

It is time to bring this issue to a vote. It is time for the Senate to decide yes or no on John Tower and get on with the Nation's business.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not anticipate that this nomination will come quickly to a vote because it should not. We should take the time that is necessary to try to cure the manifest unfairness of the process to date. And this discussion of John Tower and all of its unpleasant particulars has become a referendum on the process itself, a referendum on the fairness of the process or, more accurately, the lack of fairness.

At the time that the vote was taken by the Armed Services Committee resulting in a straight party line vote—although members of the majority on that committee had been heard by reporters shortly before the vote as indicating no difficulty in supporting Senator Tower—the result proved otherwise. But at the time that vote was taken, there were expressions by the majority that, fair or not, factual or not, a perception had been created about Senator Tower that made it impossible for him to do the job, and that however regretfully they might feel about it, members of the majority were, therefore, compelled to vote against his confirmation.

This is the argument that has stirred such outrage on the part of those not necessarily friends of John Tower, but those who are concerned about fairness. A commentator has recently written: You do not have to love John Tower to be very concerned about the process of fairness in his treatment. And, indeed, what is at stake here is more important even than fairness to this nominee who, in my judgment, is without doubt the smartest, toughest, most knowledgeable, most experienced, best prepared nominee to handle the awesome responsibilities of the Secretary of Defense in the history of this Nation.

But what is more important than John Tower, more important even than, according to a President, his right to his nominee, and never in the history of this Nation have we denied a new President his nominee, what is more important is that we care not just about the process for its own sake, but care enough to cure it of the distortion and the contamination that has infected it. Because what is at stake here is the deception of the American people. They should not be permitted to deal in the kind of misconception that has been foisted upon them by the process to date.

Several polls have indicated that the American people disapprove of Senator Tower. Well, how, Mr. President, could it be otherwise? How could they think anything else than that he is a drunk and a womanizer and someone eager to engage in the lining of his pockets, because that has been what they have heard on the network evening news.

They have read fanciful stories on the front pages of America's major newspapers, stories which, in the due course of time, have proved to be false, and have been dealt with not by retractions exactly, but by presumptively curative stories a couple of days later, not on the front page, but buried in the back of the paper.

Mr. President, it is this syllogism that there is a perception, and that perceptions must govern, that is so pernicious to the process and to the American people because it is a self-fulfilling prophecy, not in the sense that those who are relying on it necessarily created the false perception, although there have been some very careless statements that clearly have contributed to it, but what we do know is that anonymous allegations representing, in my judgment, the worst kind of moral cowardice, the worst kind of treachery, have resulted in the trashing of a good man's reputation, in a public process that offers him virtually no opportunity for rebuttal.

The American people have heard allegations, and they are not, I think, to be expected to go through the process of trying to test allegations which in fact they cannot test. They can no more cross-examine allegations from witnesses not under oath, not even identified by their real names, than can those of us who have read summaries of the FBI files.

But there is a very grave concern, Mr. President, and it is not shared just by the friends of John Tower. Let me read from a Wall Street Journal editorial of March 6 appropriately entitled "Character Assassination." In the editorial concern is expressed by one of America's leading liberal commentators, a man who in the best traditions of American liberalism is concerned about the fairness of process and clearly from his words concerned about the destruction of reputations by innuendo. The distinguished writer, Anthony Lewis, writing in the New York Times, which was subsequently quoted by the Wall Street Journal said:

> Reliance on untested accusations evokes one of the nastiest periods in our national life, the McCarthy era. Those evil days may sound like ancient history. But the case of John Tower is by no means the only indication that destruction by uncorroborated charges still goes on.

I think he said it with characteristic eloquence, "destruction by uncorroborated charges."

So I would say to my friend from California, my senior colleague, that I disagree, respectfully, with his comment just now that really there need be no more said than that he disapproves of the nomination. To the contrary, with all due respect, I urge that not only he but other Senators be specific, that they state the fact or facts upon which they rely upon in casting a "no" vote on confirmation, because they owe it, if not to Senator Tower and if not to the President, to their constituents, to the American people, because this process has been contaminated and hijacked. It has been corrupted.

To say, as Senators have, in committee and on this floor, that whether fair or not or factual or not, a perception has been created, that appearances have been created, just is not good enough. That is not what we were elected to do. It is not courage. It is not leadership. It is not justice. But it is however a self-fulfilling prophecy. It is an abdication of the responsibility to pursue and seek the truth. And in addition to that it is nonsense.

The idea that because someone has been trashed unfairly they cannot give the kind of leadership—which in fact Senator Tower is daily giving as he goes to the Pentagon and shapes policy, shapes the budget—is absolute nonsense. The fact is, what you need is someone of competence, someone wise enough, experienced enough, tough enough to make decisions that inevitably will have to be made because this administration and this Congress, faced with the responsibility for deficit reduction, will have to cut defense spending. You can do it wisely or unwisely, and John Tower not only knows how to do it wisely; he has the guts to do it. And that is why many people are afraid of him. It is not because he is not good enough; it is because perhaps they think he is too good, including, I am pained to say, some upon this floor.

John Tower was not always Mr. Cordiality, Mr. Congeniality. That is a fact. He rubbed some people the wrong way. He is smart and he is tough. He does not suffer fools gladly. He did not lose many fights on this floor or in committee or in conference. And I have no doubt he left some bruised feelings. Indeed, Members here have been candid enough to so state, and I commend them for their candor. I commend them even more when, like Senator GORTON, who made his feelings very clear, they found that that was no basis on which to cast a vote against confirmation perhaps because they felt, as did Charles Krauthammer, writing in the Washington Post, when he said, "The Defense Secretary's job is not to be a role model for an ensign. It is to keep the ensign armed, trained, and out of war. For that the Secretary of Defense needs to be shrewd, tough, and experienced."

Mr. President, Krauthammer adds, I think, a wise admonition: "The role model theory of government is inane. A country that cannot draw on its reservoir of tough little bastards to fight its battles is a country impoverished." Now, however offensive that may be to some, it is true.

Returning to the quality of the allegations, to the quality of the record that has been assembled in this case, we will understand why the American people disapprove of John Tower. You have already heard, most recently in the last 20 minutes from Senator SPECTER but repeatedly on this floor, about the quality of evidence, about the airline steward who professed to see, as a flight attendant on a flight on which Senator Tower was a passenger, the spectacle of Senator Tower supposedly consuming a fifth of vodka and great quantities of champagne. There is one problem with that story. The man was lying. He flunked a lie detector test on the question of whether or not he had ever observed Senator Tower drink any vodka on that flight.

You have heard about the pathetic tale of the retired Air Force sergeant who was not even on the base at the time that Senator Tower visited it, the fanciful story in which he alleged Senator Tower was so inebriated that in fact he engaged in the fondling of a female crew chief in a formation, in front of some 300 witnesses.

Well, not only does that story not check out, not only is it contradicted by the official records at Bergstrom Air Force Base and by the testimony of other witnesses at the time, it appears that this gentleman has a problem. He spent the last year-plus of his time in the Air Force under medical treatment for what is termed a mixed personality disorder featuring hysterical episode.

It is this kind of fanciful allegation that we have heard about in addition to the absolutely cockamamie story about the Soviet ballerina that was offered by someone who is presumably a plastic surgeon in California, who upon being pressed by the FBI did not want to talk to them. That story ran three nights on the network news. While the plastic surgeon did not want to talk to the FBI, his neighbors did talk and could not give strong character references to the credibility of that source, nor could anybody in the community in Houston wherein this perfectly preposterous episode was alleged by many to have taken place.

Mr. EXON. Point of order, Mr. President. I would just caution my friend from California, and I have been listening very carefully. Some of the things he has said have been publicly printed, and I have no quarrel with that. I would just caution him though on several remarks that he has made that could be in the FBI report but I am not going to attest to it.

I would just like to ask that he be awfully careful not to reveal that report by bits and pieces which I am confident is not the intention of the Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in fact, it is my intention to make the whole thing public.

Mr. EXON. The Senator does not have that authority.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I say to my friend from Nebraska that I intend to continue, as I have from the outset of this dirty process, to try to achieve by persuasion or through other committee action, the revelation of all of the record because it is the only way that I am convinced John Tower can get fair treatment that he is entitled to, and the only way the American people can get fair treatment.

I might say that the gentle admonition is, I think, one the Senator had better address to Members on both sides of the aisle. But frankly it comes much too late.

There has been a total airing of the dirty linen, the unsubstantiated allegations. To say that we are not going to challenge them, I will tell the Senator, is nonsense. We are under a duty to do so. And I intend to follow that duty.

I must say that these and other fantasies have been communicated to the American people ad nauseam. The rebuttal has not. And the argument that we may not identify specific facts or facts upon which to base a vote without contravening the sanctity of FBI records frankly is one that makes me uneasy. I will tell you, Mr. President, we must strip away the cover of confidentiality because it is too easy for Senators to rely upon it, too easy for them to generalize, too easy to engage in the kind of conduct that contributes to the unfairness of this process, and the reliance upon "perception and appearances." But we had better strip away those appearances. We had better strip away the perception and show them for what they are, which is fiction, malicious fiction, and vicious and unsubstantiated rumor. And if we have to characterize these by indirection, and that is the best we can do, then it will take a very long time. But, believe me, we will do it because fairness demands it.

Another example of the kind of quality of evidence we have seen was furnished just the other day by Karen Elliott House writing in the Wall Street Journal, recounting her experience having been questioned by an FBI agent on a story that was 17 years old. She was asked, she writes in the Wall Street Journal, to confirm whether or not she had ever been propositioned by Senator Tower.

She said for the record that she had not, and in fact, she noted the irony of her situation: A reporter who had been unable 17 years earlier to confirm similar rumors was now being asked by the FBI to anonymously confirm rumors about Senator Tower. And it led her to make the following observation, that what she observed in the compilation by the FBI of all these anonymous, unsworn statements to which these anonymous witnesses were not subject to cross-examination, was a process that she described in this fashion:

> A process of rumors begetting rumors offers anyone with the slightest shred of gossip to pass it on through official channels, to instigate additional FBI inquiries and to widen further the web of innuendo in which the Senator is snared.

She observed that she and an associate, Ms. Shelton, had either of them sought to "play a mischievous role" in the nomination process, were afforded ample opportunity to do so, and indeed an FBI invitation to do so. Quoting further from her statement:

> Nothing in this process safeguards the subject of the inquiry from distortions and outright lies except for the possibility that such lies might be leaked to the press, causing the accuser's word to be put on record.

The only thing wrong with her analysis is that that would work where those who are making the allegations are in fact identified. But this is not the case. They are identified only by code names like T-1 or 3, or he/she. That is a license to engage, not just in fabrication, but in the kind of vicious character assassination that has prompted the outrage of an Anthony Lewis, as well as a Karen House, by the concern editorially expressed by the Washington Post, and as well by the Wall Street Journal. And indeed it should. It should concern us all very deeply.

What we have is the leakage of allegations. Too many times I have heard my colleagues on the opposite side remark that there is enough in the record so that reasonable men can differ, enough so that regretfully they are compelled to vote against the nominee's confirmation.

Well, the quality I think we saw yesterday is suspect, the quality of the FBI files. Senator RUDMAN told this body of his own experience as a nominee for confirmation. What he found was that he was opposed by something in an FBI report. It was not until coming to this body, after being elected to it some years later, that he was afforded the opportunity to examine the file against him, and he found that what had prevented his confirmation was the false witness of someone who subsequently was revealed to be a convicted felon, and a habitual liar and a con man. I think those are the words that were used by the Senator.

The FBI report is not critically sifted information. It is not sworn testimony. It is not subject to examination, to cross-examination. Instead it is exactly the process of rumor begetting rumor, affording the opportunity, ample opportunity, for mischief to be done by those who are not identified, that has been described by Karen House in her op-ed article.

So when we come to examine the evidence, Mr. President, it is woefully inadequate. To his great credit, Chairman NUNN, commenting on one of the charges that has resulted in such titillation, that of womanizing, found that there was no reliable evidence of security breaches through sexual liaisons with Soviet ballerinas in Houston or with foreign nationals in Geneva. He found that there was no reliable evidence of sexual harassment of females, either those who are employees or others. And very clearly, I might add, there was a wealth of evidence to the contrary, provided by former employees of Senator Tower, who had served him for years. Not only had they failed to experience it personally; they had failed to observe it, for the reason that it had not taken place.

The only things that the chairman thought with respect to womanizing were that there were some examples of what he termed "indiscreet" behavior. But he found them "not decisive." Perhaps we should simply dismiss those allegations and get on to the real issue, because what has been repeatedly brought to bear in this confirmation process has been the charge that, however brilliant, however experienced, however knowledgeable to articulate American policy and to set forth priorities for the defense of this Nation in the free world, Senator Tower is somehow not to be trusted, because you cannot call him at 2 in the morning and be certain that he will be clearheaded. This is based upon another interesting syllogism. A sort of metamorphosis from butterfly to moth.

Senator Tower has acknowledged that, in the seventies, there were occasions when he drank too much. I dare say he is not alone in being able to make such a statement, among Members or former Members of this body. The question is, rather, does that lead to what has been, in effect, a charge of incapacity, or unreliability?

I want to say that there has not been, until yesterday, a single Member of this body, or anyone else, who has ever charged that they had observed or known of any instance when Senator Tower was, in any way, impaired in the performance of his duty. To the contrary, the testimonials are ringing endorsements of his performance to his Nation.

So what we have by way of evidence that this man has an alcohol problem, is the extrapolation from first having had too much to drink on occasion in the seventies, to a drinking problem, to abuse of alcohol, to a virtual allegation of alcoholism. What we have is the kind of evidence that I will tell you would not last 10 seconds in a court of law. It would be ruled inadmissible. The material might be admitted, but it would be impeached, like the attendant who flunked the lie detector test, like the sergeant who was not present at the time that he alleges Senator Tower engaged in this absurd behavior, like so many other instances which are contradicted by the weight of the evidence.

In the little colloquy between Senator EXON and Senator SPECTER, there was evidently a misunderstanding about what had actually been said. It is not that there are not allegations against Senator Tower. It is that allegation by the 1 and 13, and he/she, are not just contradicted by the overwhelming weight of evidence, by people who are willing to be identified and people who did not see him once in the bar at the Jefferson, but by people who have known him closely and observed him extensively for years and years, as well as the factual impeachment of those witnesses who, unwilling to be identified, or in some cases were there, have been found, to use Mr. Lewis' words, to have engaged in destruction by uncorroborated evidence.

If you look at the evidence, the most serious arises from, again, the admission, which Senator Tower made in advance of any other public revelation of it, that he did have too much to drink at times in the seventies. A young man on his staff, who traveled with him, has told Senators that he observed Senator Tower in a condition of inebriation. When the FBI asked him about it, he suggested that, yes, that probably did impair his judgment.

Well, I am prepared to stipulate that a drunk is impaired in many ways, that his decisionmaking ability at that moment is certainly suspect, not someone you would want to rely upon for a decision, even as to which toothbrush he will choose. But the fact of the matter is, the observation, uncontested, that someone witnessed Senator Tower inebriated twice during a period of 8 years, more than 10 years ago, is not the portrayal of someone with a drinking problem, someone who abuses alcohol, someone who in fact is not reliable, who cannot be relied upon when called at 2 o'clock in the morning in a moment of crisis. That is not true. It is not fair.

What we do know is that those who have had the opportunity to work with this man and who have observed him closely—not just in the seventies, at a time before he gave up drinking scotch, but since then, from individuals who have seen him under pressure, working the longest hours—have a very different view of him. I am not going to go through all the Senators on both sides of the aisle who have given tributes to John Tower. I am not talking just about their rating of his quality of performance. I am talking about the fact that six members of the Armed Services Committee, Democratic members, had no problem in terms of the Senator having an alcohol problem, when they were interviewed by the FBI. I will not enumerate all of the Senators. But there is a Senator whom we all know, a former Senator, one for whom we have tremendous regard, and his name is Howard Baker. Howard Baker spent the better part of two decades serving alongside John Tower. Howard Baker is renowned within this Chamber and outside it, celebrated for his unquestioned fairness and integrity. His public pronouncement has been that to suggest that John Tower has a drinking problem or an alcohol problem is ludicrous. The ringing endorsement given by Max Kampelman, who had the opportunity to work for Senator Tower for 14 months that he served as the chief negotiator for the U.S. START talks in Geneva, totally rebuts allegations that Senator Tower abused alcohol during that period.

In fact, there are really only three alleged percipient witnesses to Senator Tower's abuse of alcohol during the period of the eighties. There is no contradiction of his having given up scotch. It is well known that when he married Lila Tower, his life changed, that he was persuaded to greatly alter his drinking habits.

There were three witnesses who claim that they have observed firsthand his abuse of alcohol during the 1980's. First was Mr. Weyrich, whose statements upon review I think really invite cross-examination; It would seem that he did nothing else on those occasions but spend the entire evening observing Senator Tower. But let us assume for the sake of argument that there is one witness who thinks that from his table across the room, he was able to observe something. Second there is the other man who has been talked of this morning by Senator SPECTER who furnished three specific dates in which he claimed he saw Senator Tower inebriated in the bar of the Jefferson and, of course, the Senator was not within the city on those three dates. And finally there is the discredited airline steward who cannot pass the lie detector test.

Against these individuals you have the testimony of Howard Baker. You have the testimony of Max Kampelman. And you have literally dozens and dozens and dozens of Americans of both parties, as indeed Howard Baker and Max Kampelman are respectively Republican and Democrat, who give not just an endorsement to this nomination, but specifically rebut the charges that John Tower cannot be relied upon.

Yesterday a dear friend of mine and a colleague took the floor to announce with regret that he could not support Senator Tower. And in the course of his remarks he used the phrase "under the influence of alcohol." My friend, the senior Senator from Arizona, used that phrase. He said that he had observed Senator Tower on this floor under the influence of alcohol, which stirred some resentment in Senator RUDMAN, Senator SPECTER, and I confess, in me, observing it on closed-circuit television.

I was shocked to hear my usually careful and precise friend use a phrase which is very clearly imprecise. The phrase, I just say, was most ill advised because it is imprecise when fairness demands that Senators not imply but state clearly the facts upon which they will base this most important and serious vote for or against confirmation.

What did the Senator mean by his use of the phrase "under the influence?" Is he saying that he has seen Senator Tower on the floor inebriated, incapacitated, unable to participate rationally in debate or to cast a sober and careful vote?

I hope that is not what he meant, and I do not believe that it is because in fact I do not think that he or anyone else can even begin to make that statement because it is not true.

If he has information to the contrary, I challenge him or any other Senator to come to this floor and recite the date, the vote, and the facts upon which that charge is leveled.

But I do not think that is what he meant. If what he meant was simply that he has come to this floor and seen Senator Tower participate in the work of this body after he has had a glass of wine, I am prepared to accept that because it is probably true of about 85 percent of his colleagues. There are some teetotalers among us.

But how many times, I ask my friends, have we witnessed the return to this floor of a whole gaggle of Senators coming back in black tie from one of those innumerable black tie dinners that are endemic to this city, where they have been participating in one good cause or another when they have seen colleagues who have had a glass of wine with dinner, perhaps two, or perhaps a cocktail before? And do these Senators upon the return, do they refrain from voting on these occasions? And indeed should they? It is a proper question.

Now you may say, this is not the same as dealing with an international security crisis at 2 o'clock in the morning. Well, no, it is not. But I assume that every Member of this body takes very seriously the vote he casts on any substantive matter. And I will tell you that some of the most serious votes we have cast, some of the most important, have been cast late at night or early in the morning, and during this time I have never seen a Senator disqualify himself nor herself nor did another Senator seek to disqualify a colleague because he or she had had a glass of wine off the floor. It happens virtually every afternoon that there is some worthy organization holding a cocktail reception within steps of this Chamber, and this has been true in Republican and Democratic majorities. We have not forbidden the serving of alcohol in this building. To the contrary, almost every afternoon Senators attend such receptions being honored by some group or another. They are served alcohol, not to excess. And they return to this floor and cast votes. And

I do not think that I have seen anybody that I though should not have done so. But I will tell you this: I have never ever seen John Tower come to this floor when he was not at the top of this game, able to give better than he got in debate, able to conduct articulate, well-reasoned, forceful arguments, perhaps too forceful. The fact of the matter is no one has seen that because it has never happened.

So the question is not whether or not someone is under the influence, if that is your definition of having a glass of wine at a reception or at a dinner and then having returned to vote. The question is: Were you impaired? And John Tower never has been, not on this floor, not in a conference at 2 or 3 in the morning with the House of Representatives Armed Services Committee. No one has seen him in that condition.

And that is the proper focus of this investigation. And to say that someone who in a moment of relaxation has had too much to drink more than 10 years ago twice over a period of 8 years is thereby disqualified as having a drinking problem, that makes him unreliable, that is nonsense on its face. It is palpably unfair.

Mr. President, if it seems to you and others that you have heard anger in the tone of this Senator and others on this floor, you are correct. What you heard is outrage at the trashing of not just a good and decent man, one who may have rubbed some colleagues the wrong way on occasion—have we not all?—but what you have heard is outrage and fear at the prospect of setting a very ugly and dangerous precedent.

The precedent is that a false perception is created by the leakage of allegations anonymously and in cowardly fashion to assassinate the character of a nominee and then Senators rely upon that very perception as their excuse for voting against his confirmation.

Mr. President, the American people expect better of us. They are entitled to it.

What we are focused upon is the fitness or this candidate, and it has come down to a single question as it relates to the so-called alcohol problem.

Can he be relied upon in a moment of crisis? It is right to ask. It is right to say and legitimate to require that he be ready at any moment, because the Secretary of Defense is never off duty. It is for that reason, then legitimate, for Senator Tower to have undertaken an extraordinary step, one that goes far beyond clearly anything that we impose on ourselves in this body. He has made certain that he will be able to discharge his responsibilities at any hour of the day or night by taking a vow of total abstinence. He will not drink during the period for which he serves as Secretary of Defense.

Can he be relied upon to keep that pledge? There have been a number of snide innuendos that you cannot trust a drunk.

Well, I am going to conclude, Mr. President, with a statement that I think bears directly and with great relevance upon that precise question. Before I read this letter, let me explain why I am introducing it into the RECORD. It comes from someone who had an opportunity to observe Senator Tower perhaps more closely than anyone else over a longer period, a member of his staff who served him in one capacity or another for over two decades with the exception of the period of 3 years that he served in the Army in Vietnam.

Philip A. Charles has special testimony to which Senators should pay special attention. He has had the courage to come forward and put in writing, authorizing me to put his letter into the RECORD, an extraordinary statement. Philip Charles is a recovering alcoholic. He is recovering because John Tower insisted that he had a problem, insisted that he seek treatment. And Philip Charles today thanks God that John Tower had the moral courage to insist that he do so.

This is the statement from Philip Charles:

DEAR SENATOR WILSON: As a staff member for Senator Tower from 1964 until his retirement in 1985, I am moved by the tone and direction of the ongoing Senate debate to lend my opinion as to his fitness to become Secretary of Defense.

I will not iterate the considerable skills and qualifications which make Senator Tower eminently suitable for this critical post; those criteria were established early on in the confirmation process. Rather, as an individual who had a longer and closer relationship with him of any of the staff, both as a legislative assistant and principal travel aide, I feel competent in addressing the notion of alcohol abuse which has figured so prominent in the debate over Senator Tower's fitness to serve.

Without belaboring the point, I state simply that I am unaware of any instance when Senator Tower's judgment or ability to render reasonable and cogent decisions on matters of import was impaired owing to alcohol abuse or dependency.

And listen, my friends, closely to this next sentence:

My observations in that regard are from the perspective of a recovering alcoholic who sought treatment for my alcoholism in 1979 at the insistence of Senator Tower and who has maintained sobriety since that time. In my view, Senator Tower does not now, nor did he in the past, manifest those characteristics of dependency which typify the alcoholic.

While, for obvious reason, I seek to avoid the notoriety which has attended the confirmation proceedings, I have no reservations in your identifying me as the author of these comments to your colleagues.

Mr. President, I admire Philip Charles because, like most Members on this floor, I admire courage—physical courage, moral courage. I think he has demonstrated both, first, in seeking the very difficult treatment that led to his ability to abandon alcohol. Second, I admire him for coming forward with his statement. He did not have to do so. He felt a moral compulsion to do so. And while he is not a licensed medical practitioner expert in problems of alcoholism, he does bear a certain amount of credibility and the expertise of one who has had to deal with the problem of alcoholism himself, who understands what dependency is, who recognizes it in others.

Most former, or I should say most alcoholics, those recovering and those recovered, are quite adept in finding the traits in others. And I repeat that in the judgment, in the observation of this witness, who was with John Tower for two decades other than his service in Vietnam, who traveled with him more than anyone else, that John Tower does not now nor did he in the past manifest those characteristics of dependency which typify the alcoholic.

Mr. President, it has become necessary to say these things. It has also become necessary for Senators to be honest with themselves and their constituents to say what evidence they find reliable as a basis for denying confirmation to a man whom they almost without exception have lauded as a man of extraordinary capabilities and who has the preparation for the responsibility as Secretary of Defense. If he has all that going for him, it seems that they have this terrible desperate regret that they cannot support him because they cannot call him at 2 o'clock in the morning and be certain that he will be clearheaded.

What is the evidence, Mr. President, that that is true? We have been through the evidence, and what has been presented would not hold up in a court of law. It should not hold up in the court of public opinion. But public opinion has been so completely contaminated by the leakage of allegations that we can hardly expect the American people to understand the truth because it has not been presented to them.

It is our responsibility on this floor because we have access to the materials that the public does not have to see to it that we cure the defects in this contaminated process. However Chairman NUNN may have sought, through the rigors of a systematic examination of evidence, to protect against that contamination, someone, someone, Mr. President, has succeeded in corrupting the process. And Senators dare not succumb to the temptation for whatever reason to ignore the truth, whether it be in the form of the inadequacy of testimony of witnesses who have been impeached or discredited or found to be lying. We cannot say of those who make these anonymous allegations that they have no known motive to lie when we find them lying.

The best cure for the defects of this contaminated process would be the release of the full record. And I think perhaps I was the first Member on this floor to call for that.

I will tell you that I do not think we should ever go through another confirmation for this post at least for Secretary of Defense without swearing witnesses and affording the opportunity for cross-examination. If Senator RUDMAN had been afforded such an opportunity, he may have been in this city, perhaps not as a Senator, but in an appointive capacity far earlier. To deny the American people the truth is to corrupt this process and to create a dangerous and ugly precedent.

I personally think we ought to reopen the hearings. I think we ought to call witnesses and swear them and cross-examine them. But I will tell you this, Mr. President, I doubt that T-1 or 13 or he/she would be willing to come forward and subject themselves to that process.

I do not think they would have the guts because I think there is reason to suspect that they are not telling the truth.

Mr. President, one of the things this body had better do very soon is address the problem—and that understates it considerably—the very, very serious problem of the kind of leakage that has, in fact, contaminated this process. It will be more than dangerous if this body finds that it cannot engage in what have been time-honored and traditionally respected processes because, in fact, those processes are undermined. We will destroy truth, Mr. President. And in what is supposed to be the world's most exclusive club, the world's greatest deliberative body, at the very least we and our constituents should be able to expect that each Member will set his or her word as his or her bond, and treasure that above all else.

Mr. President, this has been an ugly business. No one has enjoyed it. No one is really enjoying the prolongation of it. But it is necessary to take what time shall be required in order to set the record straight. This record simply does not allow the conclusion that John Tower is not fit to be Secretary of Defense. To the contrary, it bellows that the detractors have no legitimate evidence upon which to base that contention and we will do the most serious disservice if we allow this process to remain contaminated and corrupt.

I would hope, Mr. President, that this body values the integrity of this Nation above all partisan considerations. I would hope that would be true. Perhaps, if we can make plain what is contained in this record and the American people have an opportunity to learn the truth, perhaps then John Tower will be vindicated as, in fact, he deserves to be vindicated. But what is more important, again, than John Tower or than the President's right to his nominee, is that this process be cleansed. It is not at this moment a clean process. It has been contaminated by forces presumably outside this body. But it is possible for this body to correct that deficiency and I plead with my colleagues, with great respect and affection for each, that they will do so.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a request?

Mr. WILSON. I yield. I am happy to yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, yesterday I referred to some statistics that were provided to me from the Library of Congress. I have now received the complete statistics.

I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum to me and the enclosures from Rogelio Garcia of the Government Operations and Management Section of the Government Division of the Library of Congress be printed in the RECORD without interrupting the Senator's speech.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 7, 1989.

To: Hon. Ted Stevens. Attn: Michelle Stone.

From: Rogelio Garcia, Analyst in American National Government, Government Operations and Management Section, Government Division.

Subject: Senators Who Later Served in Cabinet Positions.

This memorandum is sent in response to your inquiry and our subsequent telephone conversation for a list of all U.S. Senators who later served in Cabinet positions.

Since the beginning of Federal Government, eighty-four Senators subsequent to their service in the Senate have served in Cabinet positions (sixty-six in the 19th Century and eighteen in the 20th Century).

Nearly all the nominations were confirmed either on the same day as or within a few days of their nomination date. Approximately ten percent of the nominations, however, have taken longer than ten days to be confirmed. In the 19th Century they included: Louis McLane to be Secretary of the Treasury (thirty-seven days), Edward Livingston to be Secretary of State (twenty-six days), Return J. Meigs to be Postmaster General (twenty-three days), Albert Gallatin to be Secretary of the Treasury (twenty days) and Levi Woodbury to be Secretary of the Navy (twenty days). In the 20th century they included: Nicholas F. Brady to be Secretary of the Treasury (thirty-five days) and James H. McGrath to be Attorney General (sixteen days).

The names of the Senators, their cabinet positions and the years involved was provided by the Senate Historical Office. The dates the Senators were nominated and confirmed for the Cabinet positions were compiled from the Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the United States Senate, vols. 1-128. Assisting in compiling the nomination and confirmation data were the following members of the Government Division: Kevin J. Coleman, Gary Galemore, Denis S. Rutkus, and James V. Saturno. Gregory Harness of the Senate Library also provided data on confirmations and nominations.

The data are provided below. Listed first are Senators who served as Cabinet Members in the 19th Century, followed by those with Cabinet service in the 20th century. If I can be of further assistance, please call me at 707-8687.

CABINET AND OTHER HIGH LEVEL NOMINATIONS THAT FAILED TO BE CONFIRMED, 1789-1988

(By Rogelio Garcia, Analyst in American National Government, Government Division, March 3, 1989)

SUMMARY

When considering a Presidential nomination, the Senate is sometimes placed in a difficult position if it finds serious fault with the nominee. It is expected to ensure the quality, competence and integrity of the nominee, but it is also expected to respect the President's prerogative to choose his advisers. Occasionally, the expectations clash and a struggle ensues between the Senate and the President. The end result may be, and sometimes is, a nomination which fails to receive Senate confirmation.

This report provides a brief historical overview of failed nominations to the Cabinet and, where Senate opposition was discernible, to positions in charge of independent agencies and agencies within Executive Departments. Background information is provided on eight Cabinet nominations that were rejected on the floor of the Senate, four that were withdrawn, and two that died in committee. Comparable information is provided on four nominations to head independent agencies and two nominations to head agencies located within Executive Departments. Not included in this report are failed nominations to the Federal Judiciary, to regulatory and other multi-bodied boards and commissions, and to part-time positions.

Finally, the report includes a section listing the reported reasons for the rejection or withdrawal of each of the nominations.

THE ADVICE AND CONSENT ROLE OF THE SENATE

Under Article 2, Section 2 of the Constitution, the President is given the power to appoint, with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, "Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States . . . ." The Constitution does not impose any requirement on the President to justify why he makes a particular nomination nor on the Senate to justify why it refuses to confirm a nomination. Practical political concerns, however, generally prompt spirited justifications from both the President and Members of the Senate in defense of their actions.

In "The Politics of Presidential Appointments," G. Calvin Mackenzie states that the set of public expectations under which the Senate operates are "diverse and often contradictory."

"On the one hand, the Senate is expected to exercise vigilance in ensuring the quality, competence, and integrity of presidential appointees. On the other hand it is expected to defer to the President's right to select his own subordinates in order that he may be held accountable for the operation of the executive branch."[1]

Historically, in fulfilling its advice and consent function, the Senate generally has accepted the view that the President should have the subordinates he wants to advise him. This deference has limits, however, and no President can assume that all nominations will be regularly or routinely confirmed.

Through the years public concerns have led to the development of a set of criteria by which the Senate attempts to determine the acceptability of Presidential nominees. These criteria focus on four factors—conflicts of interest, character and integrity, professional competence and relevant experience, and impact on public policy.

While a consensus exists on the need for honest, competent, experienced, and conflict-free nominees, "there has rarely been much agreement on what those terms mean or on the stringency with which they should be applied." [2]

Moreover, a nominee's possible "impact on public policy" is primarily a political determination. Consequently—

"Policy and constituency considerations dominate the confirmation process because they are the dominant concerns of the Senate and because the confirmation process provides useful and often unique opportunities for expressing and implementing those concerns."[3]

Periodically, the Senate has refused to confirm a nomination. Failure to confirm may take one of several forms. Rejection of a nomination on the floor of the Senate is the most visible, but the least common way to defeat a nomination. Generally, a nomination is defeated in committee, either by committee vote or by committee inaction. In that situation the nomination has usually been withdrawn by the President or returned to him when the Senate takes a long recess or adjourns at the end of the session. Finally, the political context, expected policy consequences, or other factors such as perceived or voiced Senate opposition can block a nomination even before it is submitted.

The nominations discussed below cover the period 1789-1988. Included are all of the Cabinet nominations that were rejected on the floor of the Senate, that were withdrawn and that died in committee. Also included, in a separate section, are failed nominations to head an independent agency or an agency within a department; identified here is one nomination that was rejected on the Senate floor and several others which were withdrawn because of Senate opposition. Nominations that might have been withdrawn or returned because of opposition within the Senate are not included where CRS was unable to find readily available evidence to confirm that opposition. Nor does this report examine failed nominations to the Federal Judiciary, to regulatory and other multi-bodied boards and commissions, and to part-time positions.

The data were compiled from the following sources: "Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate," "Congressional Quarterly Almanac," "Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report," "National Journal," "The Politics of Presidential Appointments" by G. Calvin Mackenzie, "The Advice and Consent of the Senate" by Joseph P. Harris, and various newspapers (primarily the Washington Post), and the writings of various Presidents, historians and legal scholars (all cited hereinafter).

CABINET NOMINATIONS THAT FAILED TO BE CONFIRMED

Since 1789, fourteen Cabinet nominations have failed to be confirmed. Eight have been rejected on the floor of the Senate, four have been withdrawn, and two have died in committee. One of these was a former Senator, Thomas Ewing, Sr., whose nomination to be Secretary of War died in committee. Of note, in 1945 the nomination of former Vice President Henry Wallace to be Secretary of Commerce was defeated in the Commerce Committee but confirmed on the Senate floor. The names of the nominees and the reasons they were not confirmed are found in the final section of this report. The Departments involved were Commerce, Housing and Urban Development, Justice, and Treasury, and Navy and War. (The last two were merged into the newly established Department of Defense in 1947).

Of the eight Cabinet nominations disapproved, six were rejected in the 19th Century (one three times on the same day), and two have been rejected in this century (one twice within one week). Six of the rejections resulted primarily from conflicts between the Senate and the President, one from a perceived conflict of interest, and one from a variety of factors including congressional-executive comity and personality conflicts. (Table 1)

[1] No recorded vote was taken.

Four Cabinet nominations have been withdrawn (all in the 19th Century). Of the four, one nomination was withdrawn because of opposition in the Senate, two were withdrawn because the nominee did not want the position, and the fourth was withdrawn because the nominee did not wish to leave his ill mother. (Table 2)

TABLE 2.—CABINET NOMINATIONS WITHDRAWN

Nominee	Department	Date nominated	Date withdrawn	President
Lucius H. Stockton.	War	Jan. 13, 1901	Jan. 16, 1901	Adams (1797–1801).
Henry Dearborn.	War	Mar. 1, 1915	Mar. 2, 1915	Madison (1809–17).
Edwin D. Morgan.	Treasury	Feb. 13, 1965	Feb. 13, 1965	Lincoln (1861–65).
Benjamin H. Bristow. [1]	Justice	Dec. 1, 1973	Jan. 8, 1974	Grant (1869–77).

[1] Nominated to be Secretary of the Treasury on June 1, 1974, and confirmed on June 1, 1974.

Two Cabinet nominations have died in committee, one in the 19th and the other in the 20th century. A conflict between the Senate and the President killed the first nomination; the fact that less than two weeks remained in the President's term helped to kill the second. (Table 3)

NOMINATIONS OF HEAD OF INDEPENDENT AGENCIES OR AGENCIES WITHIN DEPARTMENTS THAT FAILED TO BE CONFIRMED

At least four nominees to head Federal independent agencies have failed to be confirmed. All four nominations were withdrawn (two were never formally submitted) after it became apparent that they would face considerable opposition on the floor of the Senate. One of the three, never officially sent to the Senate, was withdrawn on the first day of the hearings. Two of the nominees were opposed because of questionable action they had taken while in office; a third was opposed over a question of conflict of interest; the fourth was opposed because of his personal views and inexperience.

At least two nominees to head a Federal agency within a department have failed to be confirmed. One nomination was rejected, and the other was withdrawn after questions were raised regarding actions the nominee had taken while serving as head of the agency under a recess appointment.

Patrick L. Grey III, Federal Bureau of Investigation	Feb. 21, 1973	Apr. 17, 1973

[1] Nomination announced on Nov. 2, 1974, but never formally submitted to Senate; on Nov. 12, 1974, President announced that nomination was being withdrawn.

[2] Nomination announced on Dec. 23, 1976, but never formally submitted to Senate; at first day of hearings on Jan. 17, 1977, the nominee announced that he had asked President to withdraw his nomination.

[3] Nomination rejected by vote on Senate floor.

REPORTED REASONS FOR FAILURE TO CONFIRM

Cabinet Nominees

Caleb Cushing—rejected in 1843 to be Secretary of the Treasury because of some Senators' personal dislike for the nominee and the struggle between the Senate and President Tyler over a national bank and other issues. (Louis C. James. Senatorial Rejections of Presidential Nominations To The Cabinet: A Study In Constitutional Custom. Arizona Law Review. V. 3, Winter 1961, p. 248. Hereafter cited as James.)

Benjamin H. Bristow—nomination in 1874 to be Attorney General was withdrawn after nominee wrote to President Grant asking that the nomination be withdrawn. Bristow was later nominated and confirmed to be Secretary of the Treasury. (Letter from Bristow to President Grant dated December 22, 1873. Copy of letter in possession of Professor Ross A. Webb, author of Benjamin H. Bristow, Border State Politician. Lexington, University of Kansas Press, 1969.)

Henry Dearborn—nomination in 1815 to be Secretary of War was withdrawn one day after it was submitted because of opposition based on the nominee's perceived incompetence as a military commander in the War of 1812. In a letter to Dearborn, President Madison noted that he had withdrawn the nomination because of opposition in the Senate. (Letter from President Madison to Dearborn dated March 4, 1815. A copy of the letter is found in Gaillard Hunt, ed. The Writings of James Madison. 9 Vols. New York, G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1908. V. 8, pp. 331–332.

Thomas Ewing, Sr.—nomination to be Secretary of War died in committee in 1868 because of the struggle over Reconstruction between the Senate and President Johnson and the former's opposition to the removal of Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War. Ewing was a former Senator (Whig-Ohio) who served in the Senate from 1831 to 1837 and from 1850 to 1851. (Impeachment and the U.S. Congress. Washington, Congressional Quarterly, March 1974. pp. 3–4.)

James S. Green—rejected in 1844 to be Secretary of the Treasury because of some Senators' personal dislike for the nominee and the struggle between the Senate and President Tyler over a national bank and other issues. (James, p. 248.)

David Henshaw—rejected in 1844 to be Secretary of the Navy because of some Senators' dislike for the nominee and the struggle between the Senate and President Tyler over a national bank and other issues. (James, p. 248.)

Edwin D. Morgan—nomination in 1865 to be Secretary of the Treasury was withdrawn on the same day it was submitted because nominee, who was in the Senate, did not want the position. (Autobiography of Thurlow Weed. Edited by Harriet A. Weed. Boston, Houghton-Mifflin, 1883. p. 620–22.)

James M. Porter—rejected in 1844 to be Secretary of War because of some Senators' dislike for the nominee and the struggle between the Senate and President Tyler over a national bank and other issues. (James, p. 248.)

Henry Stanbery—rejected in 1868 to be Attorney General because of the struggle over Reconstruction between the Senate and President Andrew Johnson as well as a dislike for the nominee, who had earlier resigned the position to help President Johnson in his fight against impeachment. (James, p. 253.)

Lucius H. Stockton—nomination in 1801 to be Secretary of War was withdrawn at the nominee's request three days after it was submitted to the Senate. In a letter to President John Adams, Stockton stated that he had to decline the position because of his mother's illness and for other "cogent" reasons, which he did not explain. (Letter from Stockton to President Adams dated January 20, 1801. Letter is with Adams Papers at the Massachusetts Historical Society.)

Lewis L. Strauss—rejected in 1959 to be Secretary of Commerce because of his policy views, his personality, and perceptions of his disdain for the Senate, and evasiveness during the confirmation hearings. (Congressional Quarterly Almanac: 84th Congress, 1st Session . . . 1955. p. 553.)

Roger B. Taney—rejected in 1834 to be Secretary of the Treasury because of the disagreement between the Senate and President Andrew Jackson over the fate of the Bank of the United States. In 1836 Taney was nominated by President Jackson to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and he was confirmed. (James, p. 239.)

Charles B. Warren—rejected in 1925 to be Attorney General because of the perception following the scandals of the Harding Administration that his close association with the Sugar Trust would prevent him from impartially enforcing the antitrust laws. (James, p. 261.)

Robert C. Wood—nomination in 1969 to be Secretary of Housing and Urban Development died in committee apparently because it was submitted to Congress on January 9, only eleven days before the end of President Johnson's Administration. Yet, Joseph W. Barr was nominated to be Secretary to the Treasury also on January 9 and he was confirmed on the same day. (Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate. Vol. 111, Washington, U.S. Govt. Print. Off. 1969. pp. 19 and 21.)

Nominations To Head Independent Agency and Agencies Within Departments

Donald J. Devine—renomination to a second term as Director of the Office of Personnel Management was withdrawn on July 24, 1985 during hearings because of disclosure that before his first term expired he had delegated to himself authority to run the agency while he served as Executive Assistant, pending his confirmation, to the Acting Director. (Devine Drops Out. Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, V. 43, June 8, 1985, p. 1135.)

Robert Gates—nomination to be Director of Central Intelligence was withdrawn on March 10, 1987 during committee hearings because of questions about his role in the Iran-Contra affair while he was serving as Deputy Director of Central Intelligence. (John Felton. Gates Nomination to Head CIA Withdrawn. Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, V. 45, March 7, 1987. p. 418 and 420)

Andrew E. Gibson—nomination, which had not officially been submitted to Senate, was withdrawn on November 12, 1974 following a report that nominee had been promised $880,000 in severance pay from his former employer, an oil shipping company with whose activities he would have to monitor. (Congressional Quarterly Almanac 93rd Congress, 1st Session . . . 1974. V. 30. Washington, Congressional Quarterly, 1975. p. 953)

L. Patrick Grey III—nomination to be Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice was withdrawn on April 17, 1973 during hearings because of his concerns regarding his lack of independence from White House pressure and his actions as Acting Director during the Watergate investigation. (Congressional Quarterly Almanac 93rd Congress, 1st Session . . . 1973. V. 29. Washington, Congressional Quarterly, 1974. 376).

Robert A. Rowland—nomination to be Administrator of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration in the Department of Labor was withdrawn on May 31, 1985 because of opposition to his policy decisions while serving as Administrator under a recess appointment, and questions about his financial holdings. (Robert A. Rowland. National Journal, V. 17, June 1, 1985, p. 1316.)

Theodore C. Sorenson—nomination to be Director of Central Intelligence which had not officially been submitted to Senate, was withdrawn on January 1, 1977, the first day of confirmation hearings, because of opposition to his "inexperience in foreign affairs, his allegedly casual attitude toward the use of classified material and his request in 1948 for draft classification as a non-combatant." Congressional Quarterly Almanac 95th Congress, 1st Session . . . 1977. V. 33. Washington, Congressional Quarterly, 1977. p. 48-A)

Aubrey W. Williams—rejected in 1945 to be Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration in the Department of Agriculture, because of questions about his experience for the position and attacks upon his political and religious views. (Congress and the Nation 1945-1964, Washington, Congressional Quarterly Service, 1965, p. 751.)

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. WILSON. I thank my friend for the valuable contribution. I am pleased to yield to him so he may supplement the material he has already offered.

Mr. President, I will have more to say on specific points, but at this time I yield the floor.

(During the preceding remarks by Mr. WILSON, Mr. BYRD assumed the chair.)

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is recognized.

Mr. McCONNELL. Would the Senator from Tennessee yield just for a question? Is it his intention to speak at this point?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do intend to speak. It is my intention to speak. It is not intended to be a lengthy address, for the planning of the Senator from Kentucky. I would simply say I would not expect to go more than 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. McCONNELL. I thank the Senator from Tennessee. I was just curious as to what the procedure was. I would ask the Chair. Will we rotate from side to side?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The procedure is we follow rule XIX which requires the Chair to recognize the first Senator who seeks recognition.

Mr. McCONNELL. I thank the Chair.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, we just heard a speech which referred, in part, to a contamination of the process and leakage by forces, presumably outside the Senate. Let us be clear about what has happened. I wish to refer to an article in the New York Times of Sunday, February 26; the Sunday before this debate began. The article says, in part, "White House officials * * * outlined their plan to draft a 6- or 7-page summary of the secret 300-page FBI report," et cetera. "The—White House—official went on to describe 7 of the 12 allegations."

This article then goes on to provide a lengthy summary, including voluminous details taken directly from the FBI report, presented by a person who identified himself to this newspaper reporter, Bernard Weinraub, as a White House official.

We are all familiar with the fact that the White House first presented the FBI report in a partisan forum to Republican members of the committee in a meeting to which Democratic Senators were not invited and of which they were not made aware. It is not my purpose in stating these facts to express anger about those events, which have long since been analyzed and discussed thoroughly on the floor of this body.

But I offer that incident again as a counter to the implication on the part of some of my colleagues that this process has somehow been contaminated by the committee itself or by the majority in this body.

Mr. President, there are a lot of issues that need discussion in this debate. They have all been discussed. This Senator is ready to vote. I believe this body is ready to vote. I believe the country is ready for us to vote.

This has gone on too long. But, since our colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle continue to serve notice that they want to drag this out and have even more time devoted to it, I will discuss the issues as I see them.

First of all, the issue involving the charge of partisanship. Others have noted the record, but let me refer to it briefly. We have had 21 nominations sent to the U.S. Senate by President Bush. Twenty of them have been voted upon. All 20 of the nominations have been approved in committee by a unanimous vote of every single Democratic Senator. All 20 of them have been approved on the floor by unanimous vote of every single Democratic Senator.

One of the nominations had one abstention in committee, when a Republican member of the committee abstained. One of the nominations had one opposing vote on the floor of the Senate when a Republican Senator voted against the nomination.

Most all have been by votes of 100 to nothing, or 99 to nothing. It is not, Mr. President, a record of partisanship. For anyone to suggest that we have dealt with the nominations of this President in a partisan fashion is for that person to simply ignore the record, which is overpowering on that point.

Why is it that the nomination of John Tower is being treated differently from all of the other 20 nominations that have been sent to us? I would answer that question, Mr. President, with another question. Why is it that President Bush himself treated this nomination differently from all of the other nominations that he has sent to the U.S. Senate?

President Bush has known John Tower probably longer than anyone in this body. He has been a close personal friend and political ally of John Tower for a long period of time, dating, I am told, back to the late 1950's. In spite of that friendship and political alliance, Mr. President, President Bush was evidently wracked by doubts as to whether or not it was wise for him to nominate John Tower. If the merits of this nomination are so crystal clear, as our Republican colleagues and some of our Democratic colleagues would have us believe, why then did President Bush require as much time to consider the nomination as the Armed Services Committee required to consider whether or not to give its assent to the confirmation?

We all know the answer. He was uncertain about whether this was the correct nominee. And, Mr. President, when he finally rejected the advice of many in his circle of advisors who said, "Don't nominate John Tower; he's not the man for the job," when President Bush finally decided to reject their advice, finally decided to discard his own doubts, finally decided to resolve the matter in favor of his longtime personal friend and political ally, he had, at that point, seen only the first of the seven volumes of information that were later presented to the Armed Services Committee.

So, Mr. President, when I hear some of our colleagues express amazement that anyone could consider opposing this nomination, or anyone could look at the record and find some legitimate basis for doubt, I am moved to wonder what in the world was going on in President Bush's mind all that time when he was trying to figure out whether or not he could go forward with the nomination of his close friend.

Nevertheless, after President Bush finally resolved his doubts and sent the nomination to the committee, it was clear that Democrats on the committee anticipated a favorable vote to confirm this nomination. Some have pointed to the laudatory statements on the opening day of the proceedings that most every member of the committee made. I made such a statement, and, Mr. President, I fully anticipated supporting the confirmation of Mr. Tower. I entered the process supporting him, liking him personally, believing that he had all the requisite experience and skill to be highly effective. That was before any of the evidence had been presented.

When did things start to change? Mr. President, I, along with some other members of the committee, was genuinely surprised and then concerned at the scope of the business arrangements to which Senator Tower testified in the early part of the proceedings. I was surprised and then concerned at the rapid sequence of Government service, followed by employment as a consultant for the defense industry, to be quickly followed again by Government service in the highest possible capacity relating to defense.

A confirmation hearing is not a court of law. Members of the Senate do not function as a judge and jury when they give advice and consent to important nominations. They are exercising political judgment, often under very uncertain conditions. That is true of Senators in both parties.

I heard our distinguished President pro tempore describe a statement made by a Senator 200 years ago when the very first nomination was sent by President George Washington to the Senate. This Senator 200 years ago was troubled by the effect that his vote would have on his relationship to the new President. A member of President Washington's political alliance proposed that the vote be held by secret ballot because, he said, a Senator who casts a vote against the wishes of the new President would be deprived of the Presidential sunshine. A wonderful phrase, Mr. President, 200 years old and yet more descriptive of a basic political motivation than any phrase that I have heard in this debate 200 years later.

A new President taking office, about to make hundreds of appointments; indeed, thousands of appointments when one looks at State administrators of the Farmers Home Administration, regional heads of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, is a member of that President's own political party going to place some value on deprivation of Presidential sunshine in such circumstances? If one casts a vote on that basis, is it a partisan vote?

One of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle was quoted on the front page of one of the Nation's leading newspapers as saying in response to the question, "Why are you supporting the Tower nomination?" said, "Because I'm a good Republican." Mr. President, is that a partisan motivation?

Let ms just describe my own motivation because I have detected during this debate, and it is not my purpose, believe me, Mr. President, to in any way add to the friction which has emerged in the Senate during this debate, but I have detected occasionally a feeling that it is inconceivable that a Member of the Senate on this side of the aisle might find any legitimate basis for opposing this nomination and that a no vote is just obviously partisan in character, while a vote in his favor is noble and dedicated to the public interest.

Mr. President, is any Member of this body not concerned about the perception by the American people of what has been going on in the Department of Defense? How many of us have been at a town hall meeting or an open meeting or a Rotary Club meeting when someone has stood up and asked a question about the unhealthy relationship between defense contractors and the Defense Department? How many of us in response, on both sides of the aisle, have said, "We're going to stop those $600 toilet seats. We're going to have reforms in the Pentagon. We're going to get somebody in there who can really do the job, who will get tough with those who have abused the contracting process."

Mr. President, we are right now in the midst, with the ill-wind investigation, of the biggest scandal in the history of the Department of Defense. This scandal has been caused in large part by the so-called revolving door. One of the central figures in this case, Melvin Paisley, went through that revolving door. He was nominated by the President. The nomination was sent to the committee when Senator Tower was the chairman of the committee. Maybe he should have read the FBI report. He did not. It is not my purpose to indict him on that basis. My purpose is to show that these imperfect investigations can sometimes shed some light on the merits of a particular nomination. If Senator Tower at that time had bothered to read the correspondence to the committee, he would have found clear warnings from people who wrote in and said, "This guy's crook," saying in effect if you confirm him, he will steal the public blind in the Department of Defense.

Well, the nomination was confirmed. Democrats as well as Republicans now readily acknowledge being remiss in not taking the confirmation process as seriously at that time as it has been taken in this case.

Mr. President, I will just say as one Senator, I have had it up to here with this revolving door in the Pentagon, and I believe it it time to straighten out the mess in the Pentagon.

How can we do that with a Secretary of Defense who left one day as our chief arms control negotiator, went immediately to work for one of the biggest defense contractors, received more than a million dollars in approximately 2 years, and then immediately went back into Government service pledging publicly in the confirmation hearings that he would not recuse himself when matters affecting his former clients and employers came before the office of the Secretary of Defense? Is that a prescription for restoring public confidence? Is that a prescription for straightening out this process which is so in need of reform? What about the American men and women who come to meetings in our home States and ask us what we are going to do to straighten out this mess? What should we tell them? "Oh, well, Senator Tower, after all, was a member of the club. He ought to be confirmed in spite of this appearance and in a spite of this conflict."

Mr. President, it was common knowledge within the defense industry during the 2 years preceding the Presidential election that there was a high likelihood, if George Bush became President Bush, John Tower would become, or seek to become Secretary Tower—common knowledge. Every one of us knows it. During that period of time, they lined up to give him lucrative contracts in return for which he agreed to answer their telephone calls and provide them analysis from time to time. The committee asked for documentation of exactly what kind of services were performed just so that we could get a better sense of exactly what his role was in connection with these companies. The response was that no such documentation existed at all—an occasional conversation from time to time and a steady willingness to remain near a telephone so that when advice was needed, it could be provided.

The normal practice is for someone who has served in the defense industry to be regarded as having special experience and valuable knowledge which could be brought to bear in Government service after his or her appointment, but the normal practice also is that that person recuses himself when matters affecting his principal employer or client come before his office for judgment and for decision.

Senator Tower has stated that he felt such an arrangement, though traditional, could not be employed in his case because the companies which have employed him are the major contractors, and there are several of them, so that most of the Pentagon's business would be ruled off limits.

It is true that he is not required by law to recuse himself in such instances, but it is equally true, Mr. President, that the American public is fed up with the way the Pentagon is being run and are rightfully demanding that we reform these procedures, insisting that we find someone who is capable of harnessing and focusing their legitimate outrage in a constructive manner so as to straighten out these problems.

What are we to tell them? "Oh, overlook the fact that he is speeding through the revolving door in record time. Overlook the fact that he is not even planning to employ the traditional and standard protection of recusing himself when matters affecting a former employer or client come up." He has said that he would recuse himself if there was a disciplinary action, a narrow case.

I understand the distinction between a disciplinary action and a contract award, but if any Member of this body was in a similar situation, if two companies were competing for a billion dollar contract and one of them had been the employer and had paid hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the other company seeking the same contract had not, would there not be a decision to recuse? Of course there would, but Senator Tower is saying that he does not intend to take that approach.

Mr. President, I think that we need another nominee. Most of the discussion here has been on the conflict issue. I think it is the most important issue by far. And I think that we need someone in the Defense Department who can straighten out the Defense Department.

Even though turning to the issues that have received the most debate, even though we may feel that personal issues such as reported difficulties with alcohol ought to be kept out of consideration, unless brought into play by conclusive and overwhelming evidence, these issues have nevertheless made their mark.

Mr. President, one thing above all is apparent to me. The country requires that the next Secretary of Defense restore public confidence in the management of the Department. Senator Tower, if confirmed, might eventually do that but he would begin with an enormous burden of proof having to do not with defense issues but with himself. It is genuinely unfortunate but in the end I believe another candidate is needed and I hope this body will soon come to a vote and reach that same conclusion.

This is not a time for our country to be having the political equivalent of a high school food fight. We just do not have the luxury especially in the field of defense, especially given the need, the urgent need, for clear thinking and leadership. In the Soviet Union today, we face an adversary undergoing change in ways and at a rate no serious student would have thought possible.

There is not one single thing we can say with absolute certainty regarding the future of the Soviet Union in the midterm. No one can say how the upwelling of the nationalism in the Soviet Republics will be addressed. No one can say how far the Soviet experiment with openness and public debate will take them from their old certitudes about the future and their own Messianic beliefs in a single destiny. No one can say whether economic restructuring will work. No one can say how Soviet economic and security relationships with Eastern Europe are going to develop.

In terms of the military threat, the announced retention of Soviet conventional forces are clearly big enough to affect our calculations about security. But no one can say where the Soviets will be when they complete the announced restructuring of their forces in accordance with the doctrines of defensive defenses and sufficiency. Our allies want to know how we are analyzing these questions of such historic import.

I just returned yesterday from England and a meeting on the global environment. But during that time, I had an opportunity to meet with the British leaders. The Minister of Defense in England has just canceled his visit to the United States to consult on these and other questions. Why? Because the Department of Defense is leaderless, rudderless, directionless. The longer this debate is dragged out, the longer our allies will have to wait for meaningful consultations.

In the Federal Republic of Germany changes are taking place, and the allies do not know how to approach the question of short-range nuclear forces. The Department of Defense has no voice in the interagency deliberations, nor in the dialog with Ministers of Defense in our allied nations.

Historic talks just began on Monday in Vienna on conventional force reductions. In the preparation of the U.S. position in those talks, the Department of Defense had no powerful, coherent voice. During the latter part of the second Reagan administration, the Soviet behavior in arms control already amounted to one surprise after another as they stormed and occupied the high ground which used to be ours on reductions and even on issues of verification.

In the face of this onslaught, our Government and the governments of our allies have been made to look as though they are opposed to progress or even fearful of it. Right now, what worries me more than anything else is that the indecision which flows from this dilemma is badly eroding, and I speak of the dilemma of how we confront the Soviets. This dilemma is badly eroding the legitimacy of Western policies in the eyes of Western voters. It is not that Western proposals lack intellectual merit, but rather that they lack flair and lack clarity.

Above all, Western governments have made too little effort to explain the fundamental terms of the security debate to their own people.

We might be able to handle all these uncertainties on the Soviet side of the equation given enough effort. But the level of complexity is compounded by our own collision with the budget deficit. And some Senators have come to the conclusion that the single most likely outcome of the developing impasse on the budget may be a sequester. That sequester would have its greatest impact on the Department of Defense. How is the Department of Defense planning to deal with that? Again, it has no leadership—no one who speaks for the Department with the Congress.

There is no question that during this period we will have to negotiate among ourselves to some extent but we should be looking for some equilibrium between what the traffic will bear in defense costs and what the country peering at the future through all this fog thinks it needs for defense. It is true that the administration has come in with a defense budget set at zero real growth but that represents an increase over last year when the pressure of the deficit forced agreement to cut by minus 1 percent in real terms.

The difference between a curve drawn flat and a curve going up at 2 percent a year can be very profound on scale with the defense budget. It is the difference between thinking you can scrape through until better times by handing a handful of sacrificial cuts and a view which says the hard times are here for a long time and long-term adaptations must be made.

We need a Secretary of Defense while these matters are being considered. We can adapt to life with a rapidly changing Soviet Union. We can maintain coherence and solidarity with our allies. We can even deal with the budget. But we have to get serious. We have to have a confirmed Secretary of Defense.

It has been clear for quite some time there was substantial doubt about the outcome of this matter. It is not for this individual Senator to advise President Bush or Senator Tower about the better course of action. But the country's policy is suffering the longer this matter is dragged out.

If the President has reason to believe that the outcome is nearly certain, he would be best advised to get on with it and ask those who are helping him in this debate to allow us to vote to get this matter behind us.

The administration is doing no more than desk doodling on major issues of policy. And in the area of national defense, with all of the matters that I have just described and many others as well, we cannot afford desk doodling. We need to get on with it.

Meanwhile, President Bush's most important asset is being squandered. There was, despite the misgivings on the part of some about the last campaign, a readiness to suspend disbelief and to hope for an era of genuine bipartisan effort on critical issues facing the Nation. We can still have it. This entire process is putting it at risk, unfortunately.

Mr. President, in conclusion, we need to get on with the Nation's business. But in order to do so, we need some help from the President of the United States, who can now do the country two big favors. The first is to cool the rhetoric in and around John Tower's nomination by every means at his disposal. I do not simply mean his rhetoric. I mean the rhetoric of those who are speaking for him. The second: If the Tower nomination does not survive in the Senate, it is for the President to accept that loss gracefully and get down to working along with us.

The Nation needs it; Democratic Members of the Senate are ready for it; the country is ready for it. This debate ought to end; we ought to vote, whatever the outcome, and get on with it.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. McCONNELL and Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCONNELL].

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCONNELL. I yield briefly, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WARNER. For a question to my distinguished colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator will retain his right to the floor.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, we tend to become emotional about our rhetoric here, and I just want to ask my good friend a question, because he is a distinguished and valued member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and he stood here and he said that "the Department of Defense"—and I quote him back because I paid good attention—"is rudderless and leaderless."

Now, put yourself in the suit of a U.S. naval person in the Arabian Sea or the Persian Gulf, or put yourself in the uniform of a soldier in the Polar Cap. Those men and those women are taking risks today, and they might well see on tonight's television a member of the Armed Services Committee say that this Department is leaderless and rudderless.

I say to my good friend that I believe what he intended was the long-range policy decisions, the budgetary decisions, which quite naturally await the confirmation by the Senate, hopefully, of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. But in terms of the day-to-day management, we have a thoroughly trained and sound individual, William Taft, as the Deputy Secretary. We have a Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Admiral Crowe, who is respected by every single Member of this Chamber, so far as I know, in the years he has been there. We have service chiefs with proven capability.

Mr. President, I think that perhaps my good friend would like to clarify his statement that the Department is rudderless, in terms of the day-to-day operations and the ability of these young men and women to look back at the Nation's Capital and know and have a sense of security that the risks they are taking are risks that are being watched over night and day by careful and competent hands, beginning with the Commander in Chief of the United States, President George Bush.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might be able to respond, without the Senator from Kentucky losing the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. I wonder if the Senator from Virginia can speculate as to why he believes the Minister of Defense of Great Britain has just canceled his visit for consultation to the United States. It is my understanding that the reason is that we have no Secretary of Defense; that, while there is a very great difference between answering the telephone and saying, "Acting Secretary," and saying "We need some more stationery," or, "We need some more ammunition," on the one hand, and making decisions on policy on the other hand, it is on the decisions of policy that the Department of Defense will have to make its bed for these budget problems, for the challenges that we are confronting with the Soviet Union, with the stresses and strains in the alliance.

Yes, there are individuals who can make the day-to-day, small, routine decisions. But the more important questions of the kind that must be addressed are not being addressed. In that sense, I repeat, Mr. President, my belief is that the Department of Defense is leaderless and rudderless and directionless, and we share in the responsibility for it by dragging out this debate and by not going forthwith to a vote on this nomination. I am ready to vote right now. It is at the insistence of Senators on the Republican side of the aisle that we drag it out and continue talking, continue delaying, continue discussing one thing after another—the conduct of the process, conduct of the debate, this issue and that issue. The American people want us to get on with a vote, largely because we need a Secretary of Defense to provide leadership in the Department.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky continue to yield?

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President I will be happy to yield for 30 more seconds, having waited patiently for an hour.

Mr. WARNER. I think my question was answered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCONNELL].

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I listened with a good deal of interest to the observations of the Senator from Tennessee.

I might say, at the outset of my remarks, that our European allies surely must understand that justice is sometimes not a speedy process. We could speed the process and trample the rights of an individual, but the Western World is quite concerned about the rights of every single individual in the free world. Let me give an example.

Right now, the Western World is united to stand behind the rights of one individual, Salman Rushdie, to publish a book. One person, one book out of all the many books that are published every year, and it has the Western World in an uproar. Why? Because of the right of one person to express himself. Diplomatic relations are being broken off with Iran, and the Western World is in an uproar.

I say to my friend from Tennessee, as he leaves the Chamber, that I expect that our allies can tolerate a delay of a little while longer while we try to get fairness for one individual.

Salman Rushdie is entitled to be protected in his right to express himself, and certainly we are entitled to see to it that there are two sides to the story of John Tower.

That is the only observation I would make in regard to this rudderless, leaderless observation. I think our allies can wait for a few days while we determine the fate of this fine man.

Mr. President, yesterday, my mother called me up. She said: "Son, this John Tower sounds like a terrible person, sounds like a perfectly terrible person. Where did you find him?"

I said: "Mom, it's no wonder that you think that, because all you're seeing on television and reading in the newspaper are all these unsubstantiated leaks of an FBI file about a man who served in the Senate for 24 years with distinction; and I'm not surprised that you may feel that way, because you have not heard both sides of the story."

Mr. President, with all due respect to everyone in this body, I say that is what this debate is all about: fairness for one of our over 200 million Americans, the opportunity to have both sides of the story told.

Last Saturday, I was in Hazard, KY, which is in the mountains of eastern Kentucky, to speak to a sportsmen's group. The sportsmen's group was not exactly preoccupied with the Tower nomination. As a matter of fact, almost no one outside of Washington is.

I covered the issues that I thought were of concern to them. I said I think there is something else going on that is important to America and I want to talk to you about it, and most of you may disagree with me. And I proceed to tell them what I wish to say to the Senate today about the Tower nomination.

Unfortunately, our body is awash with hypocrisy and it is frustrating to see us make up a standard and apply it retroactively to a good and decent man in order to deny the President an opportunity to pick his own Secretary of Defense. I think it is really an unfortunate episode in the history of the Senate.

I do not know John Tower very well. I did not serve with him. He left the Senate just as I was coming here. I am also not a member of the Armed Services Committee. But I have followed this debate with a great deal of interest. I typically do not turn up the sound on the television monitor in my office and listen to Senate floor debate because frankly I have better things to do on behalf of my people at home, but frequently during the course of this debate I have listened to the observations of Senators on both sides of the aisle because what we are in the midst of here is a truly historic event in the life of the Senate.

There is an effort being made on the part of some of us to try to bring to bear some fairness and balance on this issue. I am not one of those who think that Senators ought to weigh the mail to decide how to vote, but I think there is an interesting trend that some of us are experiencing for those few of our constitutents who are following this issue. I had my office compile letters and communications that we had received on the Tower nomination by periods. It is interesting that in the period prior to February 24, the ratio of communications on this issue from Kentucky was 12 to 1 against Senator Tower. It was a period during which my mother no doubt reached her initial conclusion about this issue. Then in the period after that up until yesterday, the ratio dropped to 2 to 1 still against but from 12 to 1 down to 2 to 1.

So what is going on here I think is important. We are trying to provide an opportunity for the American people to understand the other side of the story or as Paul Harvey would say, we would like to go to page 2 and give people an opportunity to see both sides of this most important story.

We may not prevail. I really do not know. I have not been involved in the head counting on this. But this is a terribly important issue. It says a lot about ourselves. As we all know, most of us could not meet the standard that has been made up for John Tower. Many members on the Armed Service Committee and off accept honoraria from defense contractors, accept PAC contributions from defense contractors. I wager that a good many Members of this body at one time or another maybe even as recently as the seventies may have gotten drunk once or twice. I suspect that probably more than 50 percent of this body could not pass the new standard that we set up for Senator Tower. I guess there are some of us who are just hoping that maybe there will be some pause for thought before we go this far.

Is this really what we ought to do? Is this the kind of precedent we want to set?

I say that in the most respectful way. I am not here to cast stones at anyone, but rather to hope that maybe we will pause and reflect upon what we are about to do here.

Will those who served with Senator Tower take their own observations over a period of years and give them less credence than unsubstantiated allegations in an FBI file? Does that make sense?

How many of us would like it if we had been the nominee and we made an enemy or two along the way and when the FBI guy came around they thought, "Gee, this is an opportunity to get a clean shot. I don't have to be cross-examined. I don't even have to give my name. I can nail this guy."

Politics is sort of a combat sport. We get into a lot of fights. We make a lot of enemies, make them whether we try to or not, just trying to do our job.

How many of us if given the opportunity to be Secretary of Defense could run this new gauntlet?

Mr. President, I suspect that we are making a big mistake and I must say a number of Members on the other side, some of whom have already announced their positions, said to me privately they are extremely uncomfortable with this. They are not at all sure it was the right thing to do.

The debate has gotten almost to the point of being ruckus, and I think that is unfortunate.

But I think the reason the passions are so high is because what we are dealing with here, unlike most issues that come before us, we are dealing with someone's reputation. Normally in this body when we have disagreements and frustrations it is over policy. Should we have SDI or not? Should we aid the Contras or not?

It has not been this kind of thing that has divided us in recent years, at least not since I have been here, but this has been intensely personal in a country which evaluates the rights of every single individual, a country which preaches that we should not rely on unsubstantiated accounts of an individual's behavior. We have, I fear, gone right down that road.

I do not know—it would be up to the leadership obviously when we will vote on Senator Tower. But as for myself, I hope we will take the time to adequately express to the American people the other side of the issue.

I have only been around Senator Tower a few times. Frankly, I do not recall that he treated me very nicely, so I have no particular personal allegiance to him and do not know him very well.

But even if we had a complete stranger before us, even if we had someone before us who had not been a Member of the Senate, he would be entitled to fairness.

This process has gone, I guess, about as far as it can go with Senator Tower, but I think we ought to take a good, hard look at where we go from here in the future. How much should we rely on FBI reports? Should we require the witnesses to be sworn and an opportunity for cross-examination if they are going to say something truly devastating about a nominee? I think fundamental fairness in our society dictates that.

So I think we ought to, once this is behind us, decide whether this is going to be an aberration or whether it is going to be the norm, because if it is the norm, an awful lot of well-qualified Americans both in and out of Congress are not going to be able to be part of our Government.

Without questioning the motivation of anyone involved in this debate on either side, I honestly and sincerely feel this is an unfortunate precedent. I hope that there will be some effort on behalf of those who are also concerned on both sides of the aisle to begin to structure some way that we can look at future nominations in a manner that any reasonable person could conclude was a fair and equitable manner.

I must say I do not think that passions that have come forth in the course of this debate would have come forth had there been a widespread feeling that the process had indeed been fair. There are many on this side of the aisle who do not feel it has been fair. I suspect there are a great many on the other side who have not felt it has been fair and have not said that.

It is difficult for an inherently political body such as the Senate to rise above partisan fanfare and reach a fair, impartial, and sound decision on Presidential nominees. The difficulty is compounded by the Democrats' control of Congress, squaring off with a Republican administration. However, it is an essential test of our statesmanship and measure of our commitment to the constitutional principle and responsibilities of advice and consent that we rise above partisan politics and pass judgment on the President's choice to be Secretary of Defense.

The decision we make about the President's choice should reflect our view of the nominee's qualifications, the demands of the job, and respect for the President's constitutional right to select a Secretary of Defense.

This debate will decide more than the fate of one man: It speaks to the President's determination of who is qualified to lead the Defense Department, advise him on American defense policy and priorities, and guarantee this Nation's security.

The President's nominee should be judged on performance—past, present, and future—not politics.

JOHN TOWER'S PERFORMANCE AND QUALIFICATIONS

Let's begin at the beginning: John Goodwin Tower is the son and grandson of Methodist ministers, no ordinary moral starting point from my perspective.

His patriotism and commitment to this Nation emerged at the early age of 17 when he enlisted and served on a Navy gunboat in the Pacific during World War II.

He continues to wear the Badge of Service with honor as a master chief petty officer in the U.S. Naval Reserve.

Many Members have called into question John Tower's ability to serve as a model for our service men and women. I think the fact that he's been one, that he understands the grueling stress and demands of combat from firsthand experience, and has risen through the enlisted ranks will be an inspiration to every young recruit.

What more could a young person hope for than to believe in the dream that just like a kid from east Texas, an enlisted guy, that someday he too might run the Defense Department.

Senator Tower's record of achievement and commitment to this Nation is also reflected in 24 distinguished years of Senate service. When he left the Senate, it was with critical acclaim and praise few have enjoyed.

Senator KENNEDY said, "his knowledge of the myriad, complex defense issues * * * is unsurpassed."

Senator DECONCINI said, "he has maintained a loyal, hard-working responsible demeanor. * * *"

Senator JOHNSTON claimed, "Senator Tower served * * * with distinction and dedication * * * devotion and wisdom. * * *"

Senator EXON noted "Senator Tower's ability to comprehend * * * complex issues is a rare and admirable skill."

As recently as December, Senator GORE thought John Tower did an "outstanding job" as the U.S. START negotiator and viewed his performance as "exemplary in every way."

Finally, Senator NUNN expressed the hope in 1984 that Senator Tower would "continue to involve himself in the defense arena * * * [because] he has the background and knowledge that are indispensable. * * *"

It is my view that John Tower's service in the Senate was not only a reflection of his dedication to country and state but also provided the substantial education and experience that he will bring to bear on his job as Secretary of Defense.

As a Member, then chairman, of the Armed Services Committee, Senator Tower made tough decisions, exercised leadership and strengthened the foundation of our Nation's security.

In 24 years of Senate service not one person ever questioned his integrity, judgment, impartiality, and expertise while he held a job of sensitivity and enormous demand; in fact, a job vital to the health of our national security.

Senator Tower left the Senate and continued to serve at the President's call as his strategic nuclear arms negotiator, another crucial, demanding position. He held the rank of Ambassador and was confirmed in that position—without contest or question—by the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate.

In sum, Senator Tower has served his fellow Texans, his State, his Nation, several Presidents, his countrymen, and the Senate with dedication, seasoned judgment, and skill—as every one of his former colleagues has at some point noted.

No one has ever challenged his knowledge, competence, self-discipline or commitment as he has proceeded and succeeded in his career in public service.

The charges he now faces in this confirmation process are not based on a fair assessment of the man's strong qualifications and accomplishments.

In fact, Members have chosen not only to disregard his record, but also the high praise and tribute they have paid to Senator Tower.

This can only lead to the conclusion that some Members of the Senate have chosen once again to unfairly politicize a Presidential decision and appointment—at constitutional and national peril.

Let's examine some of the charges levied against the President's choice as Secretary of Defense.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Some say, John Tower's professional judgment will be clouded by the fact that he was paid consulting fees by defense contractors.

Virtually every Member of the Democratic majority on the Senate Armed Services Committee has either received fees or political contributions from defense contractors: No one has questioned their integrity and independent voice on defense issues.

I would rather not proceed Member by Member, noting contributions from defense contractors and asking whether their professional judgment or independence in voting was compromised by taking money.

I would rather not point out who has taken advantage of defense contractors' hospitality in Hawaii, Florida, or dozens of other resort spots.

I doubt one Senator was influenced by any fee, contribution, or paid vacation, but let's not impose a double standard.

John Tower's ability to maintain his impartiality and integrity is no more an issue for him than it is for every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee Democratic majority: There is no issue.

A few Members have moved the target a little and questions the amount of money involved.

This reminds me of the story about the fellow who asked a young woman if she would spend the evening with him for $1 million dollars. She said certainly. "Well," he said, "how about for $5?" She was indignant, "Absolutely not, what do you think I am?" He said, "Madam, we have already established what you are, we are now simply quibbling over price."

Senator Tower was paid fees as a consultant after he left public office; Members accept contributions while they are deeply engaged in the process of debate, decision, and voting on major defense issues.

Again, I caution my colleagues against a double standard.

DRINKING

Senator Tower has done everything short of having an autopsy done to address allegations about his personal attitude toward and use of alcohol.

He has said he will talk to anyone at any time about any concern they may have or be aware of.

He has submitted a doctor's clean bill of health.

And, in an unprecedented step, he has sworn off any consumption of alcohol during his service as Secretary of Defense.

What more can he possibly do? There appear to be no answers to this question, which once again raises the question: Is this just politics?

Everyone has read a recent story in the Wall Street Journal cataloging discrepancies in the accounting of an unfortunate 1964 accident involving a Member of the Senate. It is painfully easy to see how innocent differences of opinion over small details can be blown out of proportion and misrepresented to appear sinister, deliberately deceitful and self-protecting.

John Tower should not be subjected to such smear tactics.

Senator Tower has been the victim of a squalid campaign of rumor and whispers: As hard as he has tried to answer each question, there is always one more story, one more piece of uncorroborated gossip.

This is not an afternoon tea party. The Nation's leadership and security are at stake.

Judgment of a Presidential nominee should not be based on idle, unconfirmed gossip. The nominee deserves better, the President deserves better and it has always been my opinion that the Senate is better than that.

CONCLUSION

Senator Tower has capably served this Nation with distinction and skill as repeatedly noted by his former Senate colleagues upon his departure.

At no time during his career in public service did a colleague or anyone else question his judgment, integrity, discipline, or honor.

He has been a leader in the Senate as well as been confirmed by the Senate.

He should not be victimized by idle, uncorroborated gossip, nor a double standard of ethics.

The President's nominee should be judged on his competence and qualifications, which are unparalled.

We should also be mindful of the President's constitutional prerogative to form his Government and select his Cabinet.

It is my view that if the Senate lives up to its constitutional obligation to provide impartial and objective advice regarding Senator John Goodwin Tower's outstanding qualifications, that we will consent and confirm him as Secretary of Defense.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY].

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I have had an opportunity to very carefully follow the debate on this nomination. My own understanding of the issues has been crystalized by all the arguments made by my colleagues here on the floor. This debate helped me formulate what I believe to be neutral principles, which transformed a very troubling question into a confident solution.

As much as any Member of this body, I have had my policy differences with Senator Tower. Of course, that is no secret. Whether the issue was the size of the defense budget or acquisition reform, our positions were often irreconcilable. Our public debates are indelibly recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for all to see. Our private debates were equally sharp.

Notwithstanding our incompatibility on the issues, I found John Tower a formidable opponent, and a knowledgeable and capable expert on defense matters. I think few, if any, would contest that.

As I considered John Tower's fitness to serve as Defense Secretary, two issues rose above all others: defense reform and personal conduct.

I would like to address these two issues, Mr. President, and how I came to resolve them in my own mind.

First, the issue of reform. On this issue, Mr. Tower and I have been on opposite sides of the fence. That was some years ago. More recently, John Tower has pledged to clean up the Pentagon management problems. Perhaps only a John Tower can clean up the Pentagon. Or, as President Bush has said, only an ardent foe of communism like Richard Nixon could open relations with China. I will work with John Tower to achieve real defense reform.

But more important than John Tower's pledge to reform the Pentagon is the President's own repeated commitment on this issue. He promised it to the American people during the campaign, then again when he nominated John Tower, again when he spoke before the joint session of Congress, and most recently through senior aides with whom I met recently to discuss these matters.

The relevant point here, Mr. President, is that defense reform is too important a goal, and the Pentagon is too large a monster for any Secretary of Defense to handle by himself. Rather, defense reform will occur solely through the commitment and actions of the President of the United States. I draw the line on this issue not with Secretary-designate Tower, but rather with the Commander in Chief—the very top of the chain-of-command. Only he can keep the Pentagon's feet to the fire.

Once the President has left no doubt about his commitment to defense reform, the question remains: Who is the President's choice to lead the reform of the Pentagon? That man is John Tower.

Mr. President, although I have placed significant weight with the President's own commitment, I do not consider John Tower-the-person with any less significance.

John Tower-the-person is important in another context, in my view. And that context is related to the allegations of personal misconduct found in the FBI report. It is to this second important issue that I now turn.

I have long abhorred the actions and consequences of alcoholism. And I strongly disapprove of "womanizing" and sexual harrassment of women employees. As I anticipated reading the FBI report, I braced myself for a shock to my sensibilities, having been conditioned by numerous and dramatic news accounts.

And then I read the report.

Mr. President, I must say in all candor that I truly was shocked.

But just beneath the veneer of the sensational, I found the FBI report remarkable for its ambiguity, and lacking in the kind of evidence required for any fair-minded Senator to oppose Mr. Tower.

My view of the report is consistent with the statement made on this floor last week by a Democratic colleague, who said there is no smoking gun in the FBI report, just a lot of smoke. The FBI report is indeed little more than a receptacle for unsubstantiated and uncorroborated, multiple hearsay. It is raw data and focuses on "appearances," "perceptions," and vague rumors. In no way does it represent evidence consistent with American traditions of justice. Indeed, more questions are raised in this report than are answered.

History is replete, of course, with examples of man's failures to honestly question the integrity of allegations—sometimes with tragic consequences. Consider the trial of Socrates by the citizens of Athens in 399 B.C. As Plato recounts in his dialog "The Apology," one of Socrates' accusers concludes there must be guilt, given all the smoke. Let me quote from "The Apology":

The accuser says to Socrates: "What has given rise to these prejudices against you? You must have been doing something out of the ordinary. All these rumors and reports of you would never have arisen if you had not been doing something different from other men."

Athens wrongly convicted and sentenced Socrates based on false allegations. This miscarriage of justice was an act of self-indictment by the city-state of Athens. Inasmuch as John Tower is "on trial" here, I submit that the Senate is equally "on trial." To wrongly condemn Senator Tower is actually self-condemnation by this body.

Even Socrates had the right to face his accusers. Thus, Mr. President, I would, as have a lot of my colleagues, urge that Senator Tower be allowed to represent himself here on the Senate floor so he is not merely "sparring with shadows" in his defense. Traditional standards of justice and fairness demand he be allowed to face his accusers and respond to their charges.

Mr. President, I have no right to impose my own strict code of private morality on other public servants. I am not equipped with the wisdom of Solomon to decide which sinners shall pass. Nor do I have the right to arrogate for myself the President's constitutional prerogative to select his own nominee.

I particularly want to commend my two colleagues from the other side of the aisle for their display of courage and conscience. It can be lonely when you openly oppose your President and your party. I know. I have done it for eight years on a variety of issues. But, Mr. President, we are sent here to be leaders, not followers.

As the Des Moines Register from my home State recently editorialized, the people have entrusted us to use independent judgment—not to succumb to the exercise of raw politics.

I have searched my conscience and the record with this principle in mind, Mr. President—accordingly, I intend to vote for John Tower. And I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] is recognized.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak at this point, but I was listening to the distinguished Senator from Iowa and I must say, first of all, there is not a trial taking place in the Senate. The reference to Socrates was interesting, but the penalty that Socrates suffered was death. We are talking about whether a nominee by the President ought to be confirmed as a member of the Cabinet.

Such nominees in the past have not been confirmed by the Senate.

There is no entitlement to be a member of the Cabinet. The Constitution framers, when they devised this system, gave to the Senate a major role to play in providing advice and consent. It is our responsibility, as Members of the Senate, our constitutional responsibility, to exercise our best judgment in considering the President's nominees.

I subscribe to the proposition that a President, when he is choosing people to serve in the executive branch, ought to receive from the Senate some degree of accommodation in the sense that these are the people he wants to help him run the executive branch of the Government. In fact, I, in my own thinking, make a distinction between the executive branch and the judicial branch.

In the judiciary, where you are dealing with a third, independent branch of Government, it seems to me that the President's nomination is the vehicle that places the name before the Senate. It represents the President's judgment about who should go on the court and that obviously should be taken into account. But then the Members of the Senate have to consider whether, in our best view, this person should receive a lifetime appointment to serve on the Federal bench.

When it comes to executive branch appointments, I am prepared to defer further than that toward the President, in the sense of recognizing that he is trying to put together his executive branch team, and we need to provide some accommodation for that. But that accommodation does not mean that we forgo our judgment or evaluation. Otherwise, the provision in the Constitution that we should pass on such nominees becomes meaningless. It becomes meaningless under those circumstances.

The charges against former Senator Tower were not made by the Members of this body. We are evaluating the record. The charges have been made by many others. If, in fact, it is felt that Tower should be heard from, all of these witnesses should be heard from. If that is the kind of hearing that people want, that is the nature of what that hearing should be.

The Constitution does not prescribe the specifics that Members of the Senate should consider on passing on a nomination. It is interesting, as was observed yesterday by some of my colleagues, that Senator Tower himself, when he was a Member of this body, voted against a Cabinet nominee of the President. So, obviously, he himself in exercising his responsibilities as a Senator did not accept the proposition that the Senate should simply rubberstamp or approve any Cabinet nominee submitted to it by the President. Otherwise, why did he himself vote against such a Cabinet nominee?

So, by his own exercise of his responsibilities when he was a Member of this body he clearly took the position that a President's nomination to the Cabinet is not automatically to be approved by the Members of this body. Each of us has to reach our own evaluation. No one pretends this is an easy decision. These decisions are never easy and it is made more difficult in this instance by the fact that John Tower was a Member of this body for many years. In fact I would submit to you, had he not been a Member of this body for many years, this debate would have ended much sooner than now. The decision would have been rendered. And the President would now be in the process of finding another nominee to submit to the Senate.

It seems to me we should think carefully about that, in terms of that observation, because I fail to understand why a Member, former Member, of this body or current Member, ought to have some presumption over and above someone else submitted to the Senate for confirmation.

I know there is a lot of talk in the country about "the club," and so forth and so on. But in the end we are called upon to make an evaluation and render a judgment. I do not think that judgment has been made lightly by anyone who has registered their opinion. I took that responsibility very seriously before I publicly indicated that I would not support John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. I have worked carefully through the record. I have read more than once the report of the committee, both the majority and the minority report of the committee. I listened to some of the debate on the floor before announcing a decision. Not all of it, because I announced the view a few days ago.

It is my view that, given the nature of this position and its importance, I cannot conclude that I should cast my vote to confirm John Tower.

Let me say just a few words about the nature of the position and its importance. The Secretary of Defense is in the national command authority. He is in the chain of command with the use of American military force. In fact, some on this floor have referred to him as the deputy commander in chief. And that is not an inapt description, in my view.

In that position he has responsibilities which are different from, in significant measure, those held by any of the other Cabinet secretaries.

Most, if not all of the decisions of the other Cabinet secretaries, have a margin of error. They have a timeframe in which they work that permits the decision to be recalled or reversed.

If, for example, just to use an illustration, a Secretary of the Interior some evening, not fully thinking things through and clearly perceiving them, should sign an order that there should be drilling of oil in the middle of Yellowstone National Park, he can go to the office the next morning in the cold light of day and he can retrieve that decision. He can reverse that decision. It is a retrievable, reversible decision.

The Secretary of Defense is, on occasion, called upon to make a decision, and within minutes after it is made, things happen; actions are taken; consequences flow from that. And that decision cannot be retrieved. It cannot be reversed. It becomes an irreversible decision. I think it is very important to keep that in mind as we consider this nomination.

Second, it is very clear that one of the major responsibilities of the new Secretary of Defense is going to be to address the procurement problems which have plagued the Department of Defense, which raise serious questions about the operation of the Department and casts a pall over the services. It, in fact, unfortunately in many respects, has cast a pall over the private sector that interrelates with the armed services, unfairly to many people in that sector. Nevertheless, that is the case.

Here we have an instance on the record, on the public record of a classic revolving-door problem. It is the public testimony and the clear factual statement on the record. I do not have to get into any debate now of this FBI file.

We are talking about what is right out on the public record that former Senator Tower, within weeks of completing his role as a very sensitive negotiator in the arms talks, became a consultant. In the course of the questioning before the committee, it was indicated that he consulted with those companies on the very issues, amongst others, that had been the subject of his work as a strategic arms negotiator.

Senator Tower was very explicit in saying that what he provided in that consultative arrangement was his informed judgment, his informed opinion, and that at no point did he reveal any classified information. I accept that statement, but it is not the revealing of classified information that is at the base of the concern. Even revealing an informed opinion, an informed judgment after just having held that position, it seems to me, raises very serious concerns about the nominee and, in my mind, contributed to my own thinking with respect to reaching the decision that he ought not to be confirmed.

We have been on this subject now for a number of days. I would hope that we could go to a vote sometime in the near future. I know that is not in control of the majority, and I know that the minority leader has indicated, apparently, his intention to continue to carry this thing along. In fact, some have even said for weeks and weeks. It is hard for me to understand how that benefits the country, how it benefits Senator Tower or the President or the national interest of the United States. It would seem to me that in very short order we ought to go to a vote on this matter and decide it up or down, one way or the other. I think most Members are prepared to do that, and I would hope that at some point in the near future we could have an indication from the minority leader that he is prepared to do so as well.

In an effort to get John Tower across the line, there has developed what I have perceived over the last few days this attack or assault on the Senate itself. It is not quite clear to me what purpose that is intended to serve. The Senate is charged by the Constitution with a certain responsibility, and Senators are trying to discharge that responsibility as best they can.

I, in fact, want to commend Senator NUNN and the Armed Services Committee for their efforts in this regard. Well before we were ever presented with the name of a nominee for Secretary of Defense, namely in the fall of last year, well before, in fact, we even knew who the next President of the United States would be, Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER, the chairman and ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee, had already focused their attention and the attention of the committee on the need, in effect, to try to provide a higher standard within the Department of Defense as to the nominees who would be coming from the next President.

If I am not mistaken, and I will ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, it is my recollection that a communication was sent both to then Vice President Bush and to Governor Dukakis, who were the two candidates for the Presidency, before the election expressing the concern which had motivated the actions of committee members in this regard and, in effect, indicating the necessity to approach the Department of Defense, given some of our recent problems, with a different attitude than had perhaps prevailed in the past. I yield to the chairman to respond to that.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator from Maryland is entirely correct. Senator WARNER and I did join together, and we did send that letter to both Governor Dukakis and Vice President Bush. I believe it was in early October 1988.

The letter set forth the standards that we felt should be applied not only to Secretary of Defense, but to the whole array of defense officials. We confirm some 46 defense officials in our committee after the President takes office.

So the Senator is absolutely correct, we did set down a list of criteria because we felt, and still feel, that we have to turn around the perception, to some extent the reality, that the Department of Defense is not being appropriately managed. That perception and, again, I think there is too much reality to it, does undermine the public confidence in the Department of Defense and the willingness of the taxpayers to sustain a strong Department of Defense and a strong defense for the Nation. So the Senator is exactly right.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think it is important to recognize that that was a concern that was on the record which was being acted upon before not only did we not know who the nominee for Secretary of Defense would be, we did not even know who the President would be who would nominate him.

It is my own perception that the committee struggled with this. I think it is fairly obvious that at the outset when Senator Tower's name was sent, the assumption on the part of most was that it would be approved. It is only over time as the process unfolded that more and more doubts grew up about this, grew around this nomination and moved more and more Members finally to the conclusion that he ought not to be confirmed as the Secretary of Defense.

But I simply want to close by commending the committee and its chairman for really carrying out the work in a very responsible and conscientious fashion. There have been charges on this floor of approaching this in a partisan manner. There has been no appeal on this side of the aisle to try and decide it on a partisan basis. In fact, the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Maine, was very explicit in his own public statement and in communications with his fellow Democrats, that each person ought to make their own judgment as individuals and, in fact, that has obviously happened on this side.

There has been nothing comparable to a broadside appeal to stick together on a party basis or to stick together simply to support the President. I think the framework in which it has been cast by the majority leader is the appropriate framework in which he said each Member has to weigh and consider the matter carefully and responsibly and reach their own judgment. I want to commend the majority leader for taking that view.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BENTSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] is recognized.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, 6 weeks ago I introduced John Tower before the Armed Services Committee and said he was qualified to be Secretary of Defense. Since then, I, along with almost every other Senator, have gone up to room S-407 in the Capitol to examine in detail the FBI reports on the personal life of John Tower. We had a lot more to do than just read. We had to scrutinize the detail of that report.

John Tower and I served together in the Senate from the same State for 14 years, but sometimes you have to set aside questions of personal friendship when you are talking about the nomination of a person to a position that can affect the national security of our country.

I have made my decision, but before I announce that decision I would like to speak on a few issues in this case that have given me some concern. First, on this issue of partisanship, that the distinguished Senator, my friend from Maryland, has been discussing. This has been a rancorous few weeks, and when you look at the Armed Services Committee vote and the bitterness of some of the debate, you can be pardoned for thinking that it is a debate that is shaped by politics. Has politics spilled over into our discussion, influenced some of the votes on both sides? Probably. But I am convinced that the conclusions reached by this body have been overwhelmingly on the merits of the issue. They have been formed by different perspectives, different backgrounds, by different Members as they read those FBI reports and tried to interpret them in light of their own experiences. I have had too many discussions with Senators on the floor of this Senate, in the cloakroom, personal discussions with them apart from rhetoric, apart from politics, to think anything else.

I think a lot of credit goes to our majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Maine. I think he has shown extraordinary patience as he has dealt with this issue, and I think he deserves a good measure of what civility has been able to be retained in this debate.

A great deal of credit goes to my friend, the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the committee. I have worked closely with the Senator from Georgia. I know of no person more patriotic in public life today. There is no way that he would let partisan politics interfere with his passionate desire to serve this country. He would react no other way. His concern is evident to any person who has set down and talked with him about it.

These are simply issues on which well-meaning men and women can arrive at different conclusions. They are not trivial issues. The question of alcoholism is particularly troublesome. After all, the job of the Secretary of Defense is not 9 to 5. He has to be ready to make decisions that can affect thousands of lives and he may be called upon to make those decisions when he is called out of a banquet, awakened at 2 o'clock in the morning out of a dead sleep.

Does such thorough investigation of every aspect of one's personal life worry me? You bet it does.

Some have argued that disqualifying public servants because of their public lives is wrong, as wrong as refusing to look at a painting by Gauguin because he was a man that went off and left his family. Furthermore, the tradition of respect for the privacy of an individual is important in American life, and I think at some point we go far too far in the exploration of every peccadillo in the private lives of public figures.

We expect a lot from public servants, though. For me, as long as we examine only the private conduct that affects public policy we are acting correctly. And character is important. It is a legitimate issue.

The areas examined in this debate, alcohol, propriety of defense consulting, those are important issues and they have to be examined and resolved. The personal issues raised by the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, needed evaluation and needed study, and so did the President's prerogative. The President, in my opinion, deserves the benefit of the close calls when it comes to picking those people for his Cabinet to run his administration, but not even John Tower has voted for every Presidential nominee. I can recall his voting against a Presidential nominee from Texas in the past. So why should we act any differently? The Senate has the right to advise and consent, and that has to be protected.

Now, having said that, I found the allegations about John Tower's personal life without enough basis to deny the President his choice. They were contradictory. I found myself comparing the John Tower in the FBI reports to the John Tower I have known for years and worked with on Texas projects in this Senate. They were not the same man. I also found myself reassured by John Tower's pledge of abstinence, and furthermore I doubt he could get by with breaking it.

I have been in public life for a long time. Last fall I learned first hand what it means to have reporters go back into your hometown, go back 60 years, talking to your friends about everything that you might have done that you would not be too proud of today. And even asking you what you had for breakfast that morning. I doubt that John Tower could get by with putting an olive in a glass of milk without it being observed. I think the scrutiny of John Tower, if he becomes Secretary of Defense, will be intense and perhaps sometimes at a point where he will wonder why he wanted the job. I believe him when he says he will not touch a drop of alcohol and that if he does he will resign from the job. I also believe the President should and would demand it.

So why do I differ from many of my colleagues on my side of the aisle on this particular issue? Possibly because few in this body have had an opportunity to get to know John Tower as well and no one has had to view him through the special lens of another homestate Senator.

In the 14 years that John Tower and I have worked together to represent our State and this Nation, we have developed an excellent working relationship, especially when it came to those issues important to our State. Sure, we came from different political parties, moved in different social circles, with different voting records, but we worked together in a spirit of cooperation, and that was enhanced over the years. It was what I learned about John Tower during those years that made me willing to present him before the Senate Armed Services Committee: what I knew about him and his intellect, his experience, his knowledge of defense issues and his unquestioned patriotism.

This event, so painful to John Tower and his family, has been difficult for me as well.

In the passion of debate, pundits writing editorials in the isolation of their offices, writing speeches, sometimes have a tendency to forget that public officials have personal feelings also. We have seen witnesses have their sanity, their integrity impugned as they try to reach back to try to remember facts in the record of things that happened years ago. And we have seen every imperfection in an essentially good man dragged into the pitiless glare of television while his lovely daughters sit there and were subjected to it. It has been a high price to pay for public service.

I will support this nomination. I will vote for John Tower's confirmation. And I hope that the next time when I get a chance to talk to John Tower about how important it is to keep the defense of this country strong, I will be talking to him in his office in the Pentagon.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I say to the senior Senator from Texas how pleased I am to find myself on the floor at this time. Many Senators on both sides have literally taken 10 times as long to express themselves as he did, and I believe few have done it as well. I think in his own way he has disposed of this issue in a way that should have a significant impact on those who may yet be undecided.

Mr. President, I came down here today thinking that I would talk a while about what was most disturbing about this whole 2½-month history. I hope I do not talk too long. But let me just talk about a few things that have become important to me as I look at this.

First, I am sure there are some people who are wondering why, with all of the information that has come out in whatever manner, verified or unverified, did the President nominate Senator Tower. I hope everyone remembers what the President knew when he made this nomination, which was supported by many members of the Armed Services Committee who recommended that he appoint him. They said he was qualified and that he would be a good Secretary of Defense. I am not going to go into a lot of that history. But I think it is important that we remember that a number of distinguished Senators, some of whom have spoken here including the Chairman, my good friend, SAM NUNN, they told the President before the President completed that act of sending Senator Tower's name up here that he would be a good Secretary of Defense, that he was qualified. So I think clearly we start with that.

Second, the way we relate with the people of this country, either in our States or in this Nation, the way we expect to respond to the people in our States and in the country is very important. Some would say that the vote here on this issue should not be affected by what people think. But I submit that if the overwhelming numbers of the American people favor John Tower—some might think differently. I am not suggesting that should be a test. But I want to make a point.

I remember at least one distinguished Senator indicated that a constituent in the home State had almost assaulted him in saying, "Don't you approve John Tower."

Mr. President, if there is anything I am certain of is this: If again the U.S. Senate is going to look at the behavior of a candidate, the personal conduct of a candidate, I am certain that we will never again do it this way. We may not confirm John Tower and we might. But I am certain that a good lesson was learned.

Senator Tower's nomination is here. The Armed Services Committee has voted. The Senate has been debating. Just last night, one of the major networks, indicated that there are new charges, then outlined what they probably are. You see, Mr. President, that constituent is getting an image of John Tower from that event last night, from at least five like it, one even more severe. And the real problem with this process is that we are not going to be able to assure the American people, one way or the other, that those allegations they have heard and they have read about are true or not. That is not good. I have heard it spoken here as due process.

I heard my friend from New Hampshire speaking of the civility, of the American system with its individual rights. It just seems to me simply common decency that you do not build that kind of momentum against someone when most of it is untrue. And I do not want to violate our ethical commitment to the FBI files, which are just a series of questions to people, no affirmation, no verification, no cross-examination. One will say "A," and then five will say "B." And you read them all. Who are you supposed to believe? I can tell you it is unique, at least for this Senator, to try to find out how I am going to vote, go up to room 407, and almost have to take an oath that even if I write any notes about what is there I must leave those notes there. If we even use a word from the reports we are violating some kind of rule.

Mr. President, how is anybody going to know what was right and what was wrong? How is anybody to know how much evidence that is credible is on the side of the excessive use of alcohol, which is the principal accusation here. I assume it would impair him from accomplishing the duties of the Secretary of Defense. How is anybody going to know that there is not enough evidence?

I heard the distinguished Senator from Texas say it very nicely. Most of us down here talk lawyer talk. We said the President deserves a presumption. What the Senator from Texas said was much easier to understand. He said he read it all, much of it contradictory I would add that some of the allegations that were out there in the United States, already heard by millions of Americans, are absolutely disapproved in the report. I am not going to burden the RECORD with a list of them.

I only wish we could to back and have an equal presentation of those to the American people from the ballerina, to the Office Secretary, and so on—now unequivocally disproved in that record.

It seems to me he said it right—the Senator from Texas. He said, you read it and it is a close call. I guess that means there is some evidence both ways. But do you know what he said? He said, "I know him." Is that not something? "I know him," he said. The President knew him, too. Max Kampelman knew him, too. He wrote us a letter. When did the impairment we are worried about start? I mean, the chief arms negotiator was over there with him in Geneva for month after month. Those meetings lasted more than 15 or 20 minutes a day.

There is evidence that everybody socialized while they were there and, yet, his letter says—I am paraphrasing—Senator Tower never seemed impaired to him, and Senator Tower did an exceptionally fine job as negotiator. That is another person who knew him in a very difficult arena.

So, Mr. President, as I look at this, with no aspersions on any Member of the Senate—and Senator NUNN from Georgia knows it is not directed at him, because I have had occasion to speak with him privately about this procedure—but I want to repeat that I hope that if this epidode means anything and stands for anything, it stands for the proposition that we are not going to do this kind of scrutiny again. We may do the same kind, but we will not do it this way.

We cannot again look into the personal life of a nominee and have only one witness in public say, "He drinks too much," and from that, build a file.

Anyone can stand up here and say they read that file, with hundreds of pages of FBI agents interrogating a witness, as I have indicated, and many have, unsworn, no cross-examination. You can find a statement to support either side. If you want to stand up here and say, "I saw enough in there," somebody else can get up and say that is not the case. But there is very little evidence that he has ever been impaired in his official duties.

Then we have a Senator who worked with him for 14 years come here and say, "I knew him."

That is why we should not go through a process of this type again, I have said my share. I read the file. I was amazed, to tell the truth, because I started looking for those episodes which had been dramatized on American television and on the front pages of the papers, and I found them, with a little effort. I am very sorry that I cannot bring them down here. They are disposed of. They are not even questioned, when you finish up the report.

In one case, you have somebody known as a habitual liar, another one known to be mentally ill, incompetent. They were disposed of quickly. Then I read questions and answers, and somebody says it this way, and five others say it the other way. So I am left in much the same position as the distinguished senior Senator from Texas; I do not think there is any question but that, based upon his performance, whenever he was called upon to perform an official duty or function for the United States, be it Senator, be it negotiator, be it commissioner, he did it well, and that there is no evidence of impairment.

Second, I think it is unequivocal that he is capable, qualified, knows plenty about the Defense Department and America's defenses, and would have the capability in that regard to be as good as any we have had.

So I come down on his side. I have even heard some Senators say, personally, they would have chosen someone else, or they would look for somebody with a different perspective. I do not believe anyone in this Chamber really thinks that is an issue. If that were an issue, we would never get anybody confirmed. We could not get enough votes for anyone's nominee, because we all think we know how to do it better, or we think somebody is better.

That is why the President makes recommendations, and that is why, over the scope of history, far more times than not, his candidates are approved. That is why, in the scheme of history, almost every U.S. Senator who has been recommended has been approved—not all, but almost all. The distinguished President pro tempore is in the chair at this time. He gave us a history lesson on that at one of our sessions.

From the last century to this, any Senator who was recommended was confirmed, many of them rather quickly, I think. I do not think that necessarily is conclusive, but I do believe that there has been a great deal of evidence out there for the American people to pass judgment on, to help their political leadership pass judgment, and they have an influence. I really believe that most of it, when it comes to the issue of his character with reference to the use of alcohol, for the most part—that which became very dramatic for our people—has been disproved. There is no question in my mind that if you use the presumption, or if you use what Senator BENTSEN did, you can find some evidence both ways, but why do you not decide based upon what you know? I really do not understand how we, 71 of us, do not know. Senator BENTSEN said he worked with him intimately as a fellow Senator for 14 years. There are some Senators who worked with him his entire time here, on committees with him, observed him. I do not know that anybody has said they saw him impaired.

So, Mr. President, it is with real regret that I must say our process did not work this time. It worked to injure a family. It worked in a very unfair way, albeit unintentional, and a sense it permitted almost anyone to say that they found some evidence on whatever side they wanted to come down on.

I really do not think we ought to be doing business that way when we are dealing with a matter as serious as this one. I will vote for him, and I hope the Senate will confirm him. I hope, because I really have grown to love this institution and its precedents and procedures, its history and its relevancy in the life of this great Nation, I hope we never do this again.

Mr. FOWLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I rise to commend the senior Senator from Texas on his statement, the manner in which it was made, the thought that went into it, and the judgment that is behind it.

In the midst of what has been an emotional and rigorous debate, Senator BENTSEN's statement today reflected the finest tradition of not only civility and political judgment, but also should be an example for all of us as to how thoughtful judgment and decisions must be arrived at, if we are to uphold our constitutional obligations in the highest traditions of debate in this Chamber.

I do not agree with Senator BENTSEN's judgment, but I not only respect that judgment, I do not quarrel with the soundness of the opinion that went into making that judgment.

I think admist these cries of partisanship, in our judgment, when you see one of the two standard bearers for the Democratic Party, a man who does not look for Democratic solutions or Republican solutions, but the best solutions to the problems that face our country, make the kind of thoughtful, opinionated—yes, there is no way to separate opinion from judgment—rationally developed judgment that he has made, I hope it will be a hallmark for the way we conduct our decisions and our debate in the future.

I also commend Senator BENTSEN for the words that he said about our new majority leader, the Senator from Maine [Mr. MITCHELL], and my senior colleague from Georgia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee [Mr. NUNN], both of whom, amidst all of the emotion and supercharged opinions of this debate, have also retained their calm, their dignity, and have never let their emotions control the calmness and the rationality of their debate on this most important issue.

We have a constitutional obligation to make our individual decisions as to whether or not Senator John Tower should be entrusted with one of the highest constitutional responsibilities affecting the lives of thousands and thousands of men and women in the Armed Forces of the United States.

There is no easy way, there is no one way for us to render that informed judgment except to try to look at the facts with a dispassionate eye, to put party and politics behind us, to not be seduced by the power of our own oratory, and to give every Member of this body the credit that they will look at each one of our colleagues with respect, that they will put America and Americans in the Armed Forces first when they render this decision.

Though I cannot name every name of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who have done this, unquestionably GEORGE MITCHELL, SAM NUNN, and LLOYD BENTSEN are at the top of the list even though they reached contrary decisions. I hope we will remember that after this matter has been decided, however it is decided.

They have set the example for informed and rational debate, informed and rational judgment, and the Senate of the United States and its traditions is the richer for their contributions.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia yields to the Senator from Vermont.

Does the Senator from Georgia yield the floor?

Mr. FOWLER. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. LEAHY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I wish to concur in the comments made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER].

I have spent a considerable amount of time during this debate on the floor or in my office watching the debate on television. Much of the debate that has really reflected what is best in the Senate has been Senators on both sides of the aisle expressing strongly held views based on material they have read and reviewed, coming to different conclusions.

I think in many ways it would have been instructive of the country to have seen all the debate here, the debates that have taken place in the Cloakrooms, the Senators' dining room, in the Senators' gym, and certainly along the Halls and corridors.

I serve on three major committees, Appropriations, Agriculture, and Judiciary. In every single meeting Senators have discussed the same issue.

I do not think that this debate has just broken down to a partisan fight, a fight between the President and the distinguished chairman of the committee, or between one group of Senators on one side of the aisle and the other. It has been an issue where Senators have been deeply troubled, where they have in many, many instances started out intending to vote one way at the beginning of the whole episode and after careful reflection and study, deciding to vote another way.

I say that in the best possible way because they have done it based on the evidence that they have seen and discussed.

I, of course, respect and admire all 99 of my distinguished colleagues. I hold to myself the ability to differential among levels of respect, and even the level of distinguishment of my distinguished colleagues.

I must say that among those with whom I am most proud to serve in this Chamber is the distinguished Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN. I campaigned all over this country for Senator BENTSEN during this past fall. I had the privilege to see parts of the country that I had never visited before while there on his behalf. I did it with a great deal of pride and a great deal of respect.

If I were called upon to go and campaign again for him tomorrow, I would do it with an equal degree of pride and equal degree of respect.

He and I happen to differ on this vote, and in my 15 years there have been a lot of votes on which we agreed, and on other votes we disagreed.

My respect for the Senator from Texas has not waivered one iota during that time.

But I think he has demonstrated probably as well as anyone can here today that each Senator has to make up his or her mind on this issue based on the facts as they read them, as they know them, as they understand them.

I think Senators on both sides of the aisle have done that probably with more thoroughness than I have ever seen on an issue.

I have seen Senator after Senator up in room S-407 reading all the reports the times I have. Others have gone back and read and reread and reread, just as we have discussed it among ourselves on and off the floor.

I would hope people would listen carefully to what is being said. There might be momentary flareups on either side of the aisle, and those look very good on the evening news.

Those people in my State and every other State who stayed home and watched carefully this whole debate probably have a good understanding of what we are discussing here. I only wish they could watch the debate as it continues off the floor because it would show Senators who hold first and foremost their oath of office and to uphold the Constitution, which, after all, speaks of advice and consent.

In my 15 years here there have been very, very rare instances where the advice-and-consent procedure has been so deeply held and so carefully considered and so adequately debated as in this issue.

Mr. President, I just wanted to make that comment. I do not know if there are others seeking the floor. I do not intend to hold it longer.

I see the distinguished Senator from Alaska on the floor and so I will yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Alaska, Mr. MURKOWSKI, is recognized.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I rise on the issue of the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I came to the U.S. Senate having been elected by my constituents in Alaska in the year 1980. I did not know John Tower well. To me John Tower was the senior Member of this body, the chairman of a committee and a rather cold, aloof individual who seemed to be managing very well with his expertise in matters of defense and his seniority in this body.

But I had an opportunity to observe John Tower during the time he was a Member of this body and there was nothing during that time that this Senator observed that would make him unfit for the nomination to head up our Nation's Department of Defense.

Now I have, as my colleagues, gone into room S-407 and read at great length the material there concerning Senator Tower.

Mr. President, as ranking member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I also had the obligation to review extensive reports on our President's nominee for the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, Mr. Ed Derwinski.

Perhaps myself and the senior Senator from California, Senator CRANSTON, are a few of the Members who have had that obligation in that we have had more than just the nomination of Senator Tower but again another nominee who was a former Member and an issue that involved extensive FBI reports and examination.

First of all, Mr. President, it is perhaps inappropriate to reflect on what might have been. But this process that we go through is terribly unrealistic and terribly unfair. I have seen instances time and time again, in reviewing the reports in S-407, referencing interviews made by the FBI and those interviews were later transcribed by the FBI agent or representative. And the individual being interviewed did not sign off on that transcription, did not see that transcription and that individual does not have the right to the information in that file.

So we, as Members of this body, may go up there and paw through it, but we cannot debate it on the floor. That issue has been well covered in this debate. We do not have the opportunity to quesion the individual nominee, Senator Tower. So we are left with a one-way communication.

As I indicated in the debate that occurred here on the floor concerning the nomination of Mr. Derwinski to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, anybody that is subject to deposition would be very, very foolish not to have a tape recording of what was said so he would have, he or she, some record in order to defend themselves if they are ever in a precarious position like this. Now I think there is a parallel, Mr. President, because in that sense, it is very unfair.

Now the material in the reports, in a general nature, at least this Senator from Alaska is satisfied, are hearsay. Firsthand evidence is noticeably lacking. And I could go on at great length and add to the extensive statements from both sides and what is in that report.

But I think that you can construe the report whichever way you wish. If you want to condemn John Tower as being unfit for the nomination to be the Secretary of Defense, that can be easily done. On the other hand, if you want to justify that John Tower meets the requirements for the office to which the President has appointed him, why that as well can be done.

Let us make no mistake about it, Mr. President. This is a political body. We are good friends, but seniority and numbers control the agenda, control the committee function, and of course, that is as it should be.

I am not going to belabor the point on the issue of politics involved in this nomination, but I think it is fair to recognize that there is a rather close count currently; it may be in the area of 47 votes on one side and 50 on the other, with a few left undecided. So we are down to a critical area of two or three votes. I do not know what the leadership is going to decide with regard to the timeframe, how much longer we are going to reflect on the issue, how much more arm-twisting is involved, how many more times the President is going to contact individuals.

But I think we have learned something from this experience, I certainly hope so, in my short tenure. We have not allowed, each side, for a graceful way out. You know, there is a custom in Asia that is to save face. There is no save face left on this issue for the majority or the minority, in the opinion of the junior Senator from Alaska.

I hope that from this we have learned to allow the dignity, before things get too far out of hand, to ensure that both sides have an alternative for a compromise. Because since I have come to this body, Mr. President, I have been advised time after time that this is a body of compromise. We adjudicate in a spirit of compromise. Well, we do not adjudicate, but that for all practical purposes is what we are doing now.

So that boils down to how you evaluate the responsibility that we have as Members on the nominee John Tower. Well, as I have indicated the material is there. You can interpret it any way you want. You can go back, as my senior colleague has done, Senator STEVENS, and reflect on the years that he has worked with John Tower. And I think it is fair to say that TED STEVENS and John Tower have not always seen eye to eye. But, nevertheless, the senior Senator has indicated his support based on his own evaluation.

I have not been around here that long, but I know something about management, Mr. President, and the principles of management. And I am making my decision on the basis of the principle that we have a chief executive officer, the President of the United States. The President should have the right to name his specific designees in his Cabinet. It is an historic right.

The Senate has its duties, too. I know my friends can interpret that if we feel that there is a lack of qualification, we have the obligation to override the President. But I think that is a narrow line that we individually have to interpret. And I am interpreting my position in support of John Tower on the basis that you hold the Chief Executive Officer responsible for the activities of his policymakers. That is the premise that the Senator from Alaska is coming down on.

I hold the President of the United States responsible for selecting John Tower as his Secretary of Defense. If John Tower does not do the job, I hold the President of the United States responsible.

So, as we look across the board at the various reasons for our actions here, I want the record to state that in the conventional management style that I am familiar with—and not just familiar with, Mr. President, a management style that is not just conventional but a management style that works—that is the basis of our capitalistic system.

So for that reason, Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alaska supports our President and hence supports the nomination of John Tower for Secretary of Defense.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KERREY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. KERREY].

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I rise to deliver my maiden speech. The subject, I must point out, falls far short of my expectations.

I expected to be standing here before this body ready to launch into a full scale attack on one of America's great problems. I expected to be waxing poetic about our national security, fiscal or trade deficits, the status of our farms and ranches, the quality of our health care system, or the emergency which exists in our schools.

Like all occassionally immodest individuals, I hyped my expectations with great imaginings. I imagined that I would weave in moving, personal anecdotes. I imagined that I would stun my colleagues with the accumulation of an impressive array of facts and the recitation of quotes from previous masters of public speaking or thought. I imagined that people throughout Capitol Hill would be rushing to their television sets to witness history in the making.

But, Mr. President, not in my wildest imaginings did I dream I would be standing here to announce my opposition to Presidential Cabinet nomination. Such matters have never made it onto the list of preferred topics upon which I could stand and deliver.

But I am here to declare what I have stated now for some time: The evidence of the FBI report and the previously generated comments have caused me to conclude that John Tower should not be confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

A central issue for me in alcohol use—past, present, and future—and the potential that it could impair the judgment of one who assumes command responsibilities like Secretary of Defense. It is the potential—based not only upon witnesses in the FBI report but upon the witness given by John Tower himself—that concerns me. In the end I conclude the risk to be too great.

I have heard many distinguished Senators, including the distinguished minority leader—who I admire a great deal—say they have never seen John Tower impaired by alcohol. I have heard them declare that they have traveled with him on important missions and have seen him perform admirably and without impairment.

I respect my senior colleagues and do not challenge their motivations. However, Mr. President, I have also heard John Tower himself—not the FBI report, not secondary witnesses, not the hot breath of the rumor mill—but John Tower himself declare that he had a drinking problem in 1970's at precisely the same time that many of my colleagues now declare that they did not see a drinking problem.

Mr. President, the safeguards which have been mentioned by President Bush—namely the 26,000 employees of the Department of Defense—are not sufficient. And with all due respect, this proposed safeguard would fail most private sector tests of sufficiency as well.

I do not choose to belabor the point. It pains me enough that I am in many ways wasting my first speech on this topic, but I would like to comment on the uniqueness of this nomination.

Mr. Tower is the only nominee of 20 so far to receive any negative votes by Senators of the majority party. He will not—if he is not confirmed, as has been pointed out—be unique in American history.

However, also I must respectfully suggests that John Tower is unique in that the origin of the doubts about his qualifications do not lie with Senator NUNN, as has been suggested. In fact, 2 weeks ago Senator NUNN was being criticized for making no public judgments at all.

No, Mr. President, the source of doubt is President Bush himself who from the time that it was clear that John Tower would be the nominee until his name was sent to this body, indicated that he intended to select some good management people to fill key under secretary slots. The negative editorial comment began before John Tower's name arrived before the Armed Services Committee.

John Tower was the only nominee where such advance doubt was created by the President himself. He was also the only nominee about whom a mountain of tales and stories about drinking were generated.

Let me also declare my hope that we vote soon and that we put this matter behind us quickly. I believe that the ill feelings this debate has generated will make this exceptionally difficult. However, Mr. President, I believe it is time for us to stop the noble effort of standing by our man and take up again the more noble effort of standing by our Nation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Nebraska. I am somewhat saddened by the fact that his maiden speech on the floor was on a subject that he probably would not have preferred to talk about, as he expressed very well. But we saw in BOB KERREY for the first time on the Senate floor what has made him particularly attractive to Nebraskans; how we have revered him as a Vietnam Medal of Honor winner; how we revered him as an outstanding Governor. And I want to compliment him for his well put remarks on the matter at hand.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANFORD). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] is recognized.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, it would be my hope that in the closing hours of this debate, as those few remaining Senators indicate their disposition on this critical matter, that the tenor of this debate, the balance of this debate can remain as established by this historic speech given by the senior Senator of Texas. Irrespective of how we may feel individually on this matter, that in my judgment will go down as one of the greatest speeches that I have heard in this Chamber. Not just because it perhaps favors the position as the Senator from Virginia has espoused, but the manner in which it was delivered, the intensity and uniqueness of the circumstances.

Mr. President, I would like to speak on issues which could be similarly addressed by many of my colleagues in the Senate today. Seventy Members of this body served with John Tower, many for much longer than I served with him. Those of my colleagues know full well the dedicated service of our former colleague, our friend, the U.S. Senator from Texas, to this body and to the Nation.

Let me recount John Tower's outstanding record of accomplishment during the 6 years I served with him on the Armed Services Committee. In 1979, when I came to the Senate, I joined the committee under John Tower's able leadership as its ranking minority member. That year, Senator Tower led the Congress in granting a sizable increase to the Defense budget at a time when our Armed Forces were underfunded and seriously deficient in training and readiness. Senator Tower was, and remains, a strong and effective advocate for adequate levels of Defense spending. Through his leadership in dealing with both the administration and with his congressional colleagues, Senator Tower helped to fashion spending compromises that allowed real growth in Defense spending levels, to permit our Armed Forces to emerge from the so-called decade of neglect with the prospect of a modern, fully ready force. The vastly improved effectiveness, readiness, and spirit of our men and women in uniform today is due in no small part to Senator Tower's leadership of the Committee on Armed Services during a critical period of national recovery.

In 1980, then ranking minority member Tower led a bipartisan group of members of the Senate Armed Services Committee in insisting that the committee examine the important military and security issues raised by the SALT II Treaty. The committee's report revealed serious causes for concern relative to the treaty and showed that the treaty would allow the Soviets to continue their military buildup while at the same time making it difficult for the United States to maintain a balance. The report went on to remind us of the importance of viewing arms control from a national security point of view and, as such, was a turning point in terms of raising the standards for future arms control agreements. Senator Tower's leadership in the SALT II debate is responsible in large measure for effecting this change, that we experienced.

In 1981, when Republicans gained a majority in the Senate, Senator Tower undertook a number of initiatives as chairman of the Armed Services Committee. As a first step, he reorganized the subcommittee structure of the Armed Services Committee to implement review of Defense budget and policy issues oriented along mission requirements rather than budget categories.

Through Senator Tower's chairmanship, the five-part strategic modernization program proposed by the Reagan administration in October 1981, received the strong and continuing support of the Congress. Today, our deterrent is stronger as a result, and we are engaged in arms reduction talks at the very moment we are here in this Chamber debating his nomination, now from a position of strength due in large measure, to the leadership of our former chairman.

Senator Tower was critical of one aspect of President Reagan's strategic modernization program, and that was its failure to provide for a survivable ICBM. He supported measures to provide survivable basing for ICBM's, and as Secretary of Defense-designate, he has expressed a continued willingness to consider all options to provide such survivability.

Senator Tower supported development of the Complementary Expendable Launch Vehicle, known as CELV, at a time when many of his colleagues were committed to sole reliance on the shuttle for our Nation's access to space. The Challenger disaster has proven the wisdom of Senator Tower's support for a complement to the shuttle. The CELV, now Titan IV, will be flying soon, years before it would otherwise have been available, to place critical military space payloads into orbit, another hallmark of Chairman Tower's foresight.

Senator Tower had strong views on the role of Congress in the conduct of foreign policy. Consistent with these views, Senator Tower, as chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, successfully led the fight to keep a large number of unilateral constraints on the U.S. negotiating positions from becoming law. The wisdom of his views has become apparent with the signing of the INF treaty, and the progress that has been made in START and in other arms control arenas because the United States has been able to negotiate from a position of strength. John Tower recognized as a Senator, and saw firsthand as a negotiator, that United States interest are not served at the negotiating table if the Soviets can obtain through legislation what they are unable to secure through negotiation.

While chairman of the committee, Senator Tower also proposed several initiatives in the area of acquisition reform. In 1981, Senator Tower led the fight to give the Department of Defense the authority to enter into major multiyear defense contracts. This contracting technique has provided necessary funding stability for selected major programs since 1982. Secretary of Defense Carlucci reported in January of this year that multiyear contracting will have saved the taxpayers over $9 billion from fiscal year 1982 through the end of fiscal 1989.

And in 1983, responding to the results of internal DOD investigations on abuses in spare parts procurement, Chairman Tower inaugurated a series of investigative hearings on Defense Department procurement practices. In 1984, he authorized the creation of the Senate Armed Services Committee Task Force on Select Defense Procurement Matters chaired by Senator Quayle, now Vice President of the United States. The task force reviewed a large number of legislative initiatives for improving DOD buying practices for spare parts and other items. These initiatives have resulted in increased competiton in defense procurement and billions of dollars of savings to the American taxpayer.

Under John Tower's leadership, the business of the Armed Services Committee was conducted in a timely and effective manner. I submit for the RECORD a brief summary of major legislation and other actions undertaken by the committee during Senator Tower's 4 years as chairman. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this brief summary be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE (SASC) UNDER THE CHAIRMANSHIP OF SENATOR JOHN TOWER

b. During 1982: 59 hearings held in Committee; 7 days spent in Senate floor debate; 47 amendments considered on the floor.

3. Nominations

The SASC acted on 29 statutory nominations in 1981 and 15 such nominations in 1982.

In addition, the Committee considered nominations for promotions in the armed services. In 1981, the Committee considered 101,583 such nominations. In 1982, 76,218 nominations were considered.

B. THE 98TH CONGRESS (1983-1984)

1. Legislation Reported and Enacted Into Public Law

During the 98th Congress, the SASC reported and enacted into public law the following 12 pieces of legislation:

Authorization of Appropriations for the Department of Defense for Fiscal Year 1984

Authorization of Appropriations for the Department of Defense for Fiscal Year 1985

Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine

Military Construction Authorization Act for Fiscal year 1984

Military Justice Act of 1983

Authorization of Intelligence Activities for Fiscal Year 1984

Transfer of the U.S.S. Albacore

Use of Proxies by the Board of the Panama Canal Commission

Competition in Contracting Act of 1984

2. Annual Authorization Bills for Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985

a. During 1983: 47 hearings held in Committee; 13 days spent in Senate floor debate; 65 amendments considered on the floor.

b. During 1984: 64 hearings held in Committee; 10 days spent in Senate floor debate; 99 amendments considered on the floor.

3. Nominations

The SASC considers all nominations for the Department of Defense positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate. The SASC acted on 12 statutory nominations in 1983 and 17 such nominations in 1984.

In addition, the Committee considered nominations for promotions in the armed services. In 1983, the Committee considered 52,587 such nominations. In 1984, 37,725 nominations were considered.

4. Department of Defense Organization

In 1983, Senator Tower initiated a comprehensive review of the organizational relationships and decision-making procedures of the Department of Defense. As part of this project, the Committee held a series of 12 hearings in which it took testimomy from 31 witnesses. In addition, Senator Tower directed the staff to prepare an objective evaluation of the structure and functions of the Department of Defense.

This effort, begun under Senator Tower's direction, resulted in the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, over the past 30 years, I have gained a deep admiration for John Tower's dedication to his country and for his outstanding service to his country. John Tower has devoted virtually his entire adult life to the service of his country, beginning with his enlistment in the U.S. Navy at the age of 17 during World War II, as an enlisted Naval reservist until February of this year, as a U.S. Senator from 1961–85, as U.S. negotiator to the START talks in 1985–86, and as Chairman of the Special Review Board on the Iran-Contra Commission. John Tower's understanding of national strategy and the issues and problems facing our military today is unparalleled.

The bottom line is this—Senator Tower has the knowledge, the experience, the intelligence, and the dedication to be an effective and, indeed, excellent Secretary of Defense. I urge my colleagues once again to consider your personal experience with Senator Tower, and I urge you to review his record of 24 years of dedicated service as a member of this body. In the course of my association and service with John Tower, I have observed him under a wide variety of circumstances, here in the Senate, at public and private functions in Washington, and on trips to military installations in the United States and abroad. Not once have I seen John Tower indulge in any way in terms of his personal habits that would reflect anything but the highest honor and credit upon the U.S. Senate and the country that he loves so dearly and has served so long.

That is my personal observation. I have talked with every single Senator who served with him in this institution and who is here today, as well as many of those who have gone on to retirement and other ventures. Not one single U.S. Senator—not one—who served with John Tower has recalled a single instance when any of his personal habits ever interfered with the performance of his duties to this Nation.

I especially urge my colleagues to consider the more far-reaching implications of this debate. At stake is not only John Tower's confirmation as Secretary of Defense, but also his personal and professional reputation and judgment. Unfounded statements and uncorroborated allegations from anonymous or confidential sources have been dragged into the public view which impugn the character and reputation of a fine American. Whether or not he is confirmed by the Senate, John Tower's public and private career and his personal life—including that of his family and friends—have been irreparably harmed. I, for one, deeply regret that result.

I will vote for confirmation of John Tower's nomination to be Secretary of Defense. By doing so, I will make it clear to my colleagues and to the American public that the public villification of John Tower over the past months was unfounded and unfair. I will make it clear that I have the utmost confidence in John Tower's ability, his dedication, and his integrity—and his ultimate qualification to serve as our President's and our Nation's Secretary of Defense.

Mr. CHAFEE. I wonder if the Senator from Virginia might yield for a question?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. CHAFEE. I listened to the comments here on the floor of several Senators who have said that John Tower himself said he had a drinking problem. Am I not correct that the statement that Senator Tower made was, "I drank to excess"; he never once said anything about a drinking problem; am I not correct in that?

Mr. WARNER. The Senator raises a question which would require a response from documents which at this time are now in S–407.

Mr. CHAFEE. It has been said on the floor several times here that Senator Tower himself said he had a drinking problem. I never read anything like that.

Mr. WARNER. To the best of this Senator's recollection, having examined the entire record, both in S–407 and listening carefully to statements made on this floor referring to that and other sources of information, I know of no instance in which the Senator from Texas, Mr. Tower, said that he had a drinking problem. He characterized his use with alcohol during the periods of the seventies in other ways.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is right.

Mr. WARNER. Never can I recall, and I think I have seen everything that has been stated, read and I cannot recall, and I will go back, but I cannot recall ever the use of that term by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CHAFEE. I agree with that. He said something to the effect he drank to excess. There is a world of difference. One is a subjective view. One is an individual stating about his own consumption, as he saw it. It is like somebody saying, "I eat too much," or "I'm overweight." That is a subjective view. It may be to the outside world that that individual is not overweight at all or has not eaten too much. But from his disciplined point of view, he characterized it as he drank to excess. There is a world of difference between that and any statement that somebody had a drinking problem.

This is not hair splitting. I believe this is important because I have heard several Senators get up on this floor, as recently as just a few minutes ago, and say one of the reasons they are voting against Senator Tower is because he himself admitted he had a drinking problem, which is absolutely untrue. And thus they go on to say that demolishes the entire argument that all the Senators who have known him for 24 year did not realize what he himself realized.

The point is that he did not have a drinking problem. The people who served here, such as you did, I have, and the distinguished majority leader and everybody on the floor at present who saw Senator Tower in all those years, a good portion of them never saw him incapacitated or unable to function in a perfectly normal and satisfactory fashion, meeting all his responsibilities. Am I not correct in that appraisal?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island is correct. I would reply that not only is the point well taken, but it would be my view that any Senator who wishes to predicate his or her decision in part or in all on that part of the record should not seize upon just a word here and there like "alcohol abuse" or "drinking problem." but go back and reexamine what the Senator from Texas actually said, and then look at the circumstances around which those statements were made. Again, it will reveal the fact, as you have said, now the Senate knows him, the distinguished Senator from Texas momentarily stated and we cannot find that record which can substantiate a basis on which to reject this distinguished American by a virture of alcohol.

Mr. CHAFEE. I want to say to the distinguished ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, that it is absolutely beyond me how Senators can stand on this floor and say, "I saw Senator Tower all those years, and in every instance he conducted himself in a very sober, precise manner and bringing credit always on himself and the position he held, but because there is some report somewhere in the legendary room 407 that somebody said something, based on that, I am going to jettison all I personally know and change my views that have been made over many, many years and vote against the individual."

Now, to me it makes no sense and it is terribly unfair to a man who we have served with for many, many years in this Chamber.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to follow on that line briefly. I know the Sentor from Arkansas is waiting to speak and I will just take a minute or two. But I picked up the Daily News today. It said, "I saw Tower drunk in the Senate." A picture of our colleague, the Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, and there is a bigger story inside, and then "DeConcini: Tower tipsy in Senate."

And then I went back to recall what Senator DECONCINI said last Sunday on the Brinkley show. He said, "I have seen John Tower with a few drinks under his belt but not inebriated." That was Sunday. Yesterday he said, "I have seen Senator Tower under the influence of alcohol. If my colleague wants to know have I seen him under the influcence of alcohol? The answer is yes."

Which is it? Which is it? Is there a difference between inebriated and under the influence? I think most people would think so. Is there no decency in the Senate? When do we stop the character assassination? He went on to say that there were others, too. Maybe he is going to name the others. Maybe he is going to name the date. Maybe he is going to give the year. Maybe he is going to give us all the information. Maybe he will give us all the information on 2 consecutive days.

My view is we have been a little out of hand here. I do not know where it is going to end. John Tower is our friend. He has many friends on the other side of the aisle. I heard a statement today by a colleague of mine, Senator BENTSEN of Texas, that brought tears to your eyes because he knows John Tower.

I remember I was in a little trouble with some of my Republican friends when Senator BENTSEN was put on the ticket. I said, "There is a good man. There is a good choice. There is a man who would make a good President." But I was right, and he demonstrated it again today.

As he said on this floor, he has read the file, but he relied on his relationship with John Tower like some of the rest of us ought to do. He has worked with him on the floor, worked with him on Texas projects. He is relying on his judgment.

As I said earlier today, we walk a fine line on this side because we want to attract support on both sides of the aisle. We do not want to lose any on this side.

Some would say, "Well, that is party line if you do not lose any Republican." I say no, that is not party line. That is a recognition that George Bush was elected last November. He won the election and with that election came the right, his right, to name his Cabinet, unless there is some overwhelming reason to do otherwise—some overwhelming reason to do otherwise. I have not detected it.

I met with the President twice today. I am going to see him a little later today. I think it is fair to say he feels rather strongly about this nomination. I think it is fair to say, as he told us this morning, he did not pick John Tower because he was from Texas or because he knew him well. Those were factors. But the important thing is that John Tower is qualified by experience and in every other way to do the job. George Bush promised when he ran for President he was going to have the best people he could find in Government.

It is troubling. I know some of the Tower family has been listening in the gallery to this debate today. Somebody stands up and says, "Well, he's got a drinking problem." Who said he had a drinking problem?

That is another thing that made me proud of Senator BENTSEN. He said this man has a family. He has three daughters. When they read this or they watch the NBC hatchet job last night, what do they think?

So we are still hopeful and we are still optimistic. We still believe the American people are changing their minds. We believe they are beginning to understand that this is an exceptional standard we have raised for John Tower in the face of the fact he has taken a pledge, and I have always found John Tower's word to be good. I think everybody has. I do not know anybody here who would say, "Well, he gave me his word and he reneged." He said he would treat that sobriety pledge as he would treat the pledge to uphold the office according to the Constitution.

But it is hard to combat it when somebody walks on the floor, having said on Sunday, "I have never seen him inebriated," on Tuesday and says, "I have seen him under the influence." Which story got the play? The one yesterday. That got the play. That got the headlines. That made all the evening news.

Again, I plead with my colleagues for fair play. Is it too much to ask to give a former colleague who served for 24 years with honor and distinction fair play? I do not think so. I urge my colleagues who have made a tentative judgment to give us a chance to make our case. If we do not make our case, that is one thing. And we are trying to make our case.

I am proud of the people who have spoken today in the right way. Nobody is out here attacking anyone. We are going to correct the record. We are not going to be trampled on. We are going to deal with statements that we do not believe are true. And we will agree that you can read the record and different people can have different opinions and reach different conclusions.

As I have indicated, some will say, "Well, John Tower is just one person. Who cares about one nominee. You will get another one. It will all be forgotten." Maybe by us, but what about John Tower? What about his three daughters and what about his friends? I think we lose in the process, too, because we will have lost an opportunity to have an outstanding Secretary of Defense.

So we are hoping that we are having some impact. I am glad the Senator from Virginia put in the record what John Tower did as chairman of the Armed Services Committee. We have not had much debate on whether he is fit or competent. Everybody understands he is. But it seems to me the drinking thing now is the big focal point. Some say, "Well, he was too cozy with defense contractors." I put in the RECORD yesterday some information that said in 1987 he made $100,000 net, Tower and Associates. It was not just John Tower. He had rent to pay and other things. In 1988 about $160,000. That is $260,000 in 2 years. That is not as much as Senators in this body earn when they make honoraria of $35,000.

So I hope we could continue to be positive in our approach to this nomination. We are willing to and will do the best we can to make certain when it is ended the American people, if they want to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will know that it is fair, balanced. We have only rose to defend John Tower when we found some inaccuracy. We do not think he needs somebody to defend him. He needs somebody to make the case that he is qualified, he is fit, and he is competent, and George Bush made that nomination as he had a right to do. Understand, never in 200 years has a nominee in a President's first term at this stage been rejected by the Senate, not in 200 years, and there have been thousands of nominations.

Now, if somebody in this body had gone back and studied every one of those nominations and said, well, it is different than this nomination or that nomination—I have not heard any of that—it is different, all right. We have raised the standard so high that this Senator is not certain we can achieve it, if we want to start spending as much time as we have spent with the FBI and other investigating efforts, on any nominee.

So I just say to my colleagues keep in mind that John Tower is a human being. Keep in mind that John Tower has feelings. Keep in mind that John Tower would not like it, does not like it any more than we would like it if we had this harangue all day long about "his drinking problem." If you are on the other end watching this on television, wherever you may be, and somebody was attacking one of us, I think you would not feel very kindly toward the person who was speaking. That does not mean we could not state the truth, nor state the facts. That does not mean we have to rally around John Tower because he is a former colleague. We have already demonstrated that is not the case.

But we do not have to try to make a record of how deep we are going to bury the man either. Two more votes will give us a Secretary of Defense, maybe this week, someone who can work with the chairman, someone who can work with the ranking Republican, somebody who understands the committee, the Congress, the Pentagon, the defense industry, somebody who knows we are going to have to make spending restraints in the defense budget like everything else.

He is ready to go to work, and he has been at work.

We want to win not because we are Republicans and he is a Republican. We want to win because we believe we are right. We believe the President made the right decision. So if there is anything we have left unturned, if we have offended anybody, we apologize to everybody all at once.

If you want to talk with John Tower man to man, he will be here. If you want him to come to the well of the Senate, he will be here. If you want him to call you on the telephone, he will do that. If you want to see the President, the President is available. He will even buy your lunch or dinner.

So we are serious about this. I appreciate the fact that three colleagues on the other side have indicated a willingness to support Senator Tower for the right reasons. I hope others will follow.

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield to the senior Senator from Nebraska for 2 minutes without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, in my remarks I indicated that John Tower by his own statement has a drinking problem, and I accepted it. The Senator from Iowa pointed out that John Tower never said that.

Mr. President, I do not wish to focus undue attention upon Senator Tower's drinking. I had indicated in fact in my remarks that the doubt of the President of the United States was the original seed that grew in me. That doubt was reinforced by reading the FBI report. I reached the judgment not to vote to confirm. It does not delight me that I am examining the life of another human being, and I feel indeed an invasion of privacy that I do not relish.

But I tried in fact in my statement to be kinder, and not to say exactly what it was that John Tower said. I converted a statement that said "I drank to excess" in the 1970's to "I had a drinking problem" in the 1970's. I would be glad to amend the record to show that he said "I drank to excess" instead of a "drinking problem."

Mr. President, perhaps drinking to excess was not a problem in the 1970's. But in the 1980's, it is. Mr. President, to observe someone drinking to excess is not always to observe an impairment of judgment immediately. And I find myself ending at that point because I do not wish to go further in examination as to Mr. Tower's life because I am aware that he and his family are watching. I am aware that they do not take kindly to these kinds of remarks, but I do not expect that.

I have reached a judgment not to vote to confirm, and I put confidence in that judgment. I am not confident that this has been a good process or has been good for Senator Tower.

I would be glad to answer any other questions about this matter. I believe that I was treating the matter kindly by referring to it as a problem rather than saying drinking to excess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for 10 seconds for an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. BUMPERS. I would be happy to.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, the majority leader today referred to a Washington Post article on "How Tower Used His 'No' Vote." I ask unanimous consent that, along with a related article, "Placing a 'Check' on the President; Framers Believed the Senate Should Share Appointments," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 8, 1989]

HOW TOWER USED HIS "NO" VOTE

EX-SENATOR NEVER SHIED AWAY FROM SCRAPS OVER NOMINEES

(By Dan Balz)

"The suggestion has been made that the people should trust the president to make the right appointment," the senator said during floor debate over a controversial national security nomination early in a new president's first term. "I think that ordinarily we do around here. But after all, the Constitution has vested in us the responsibility for advice and consent, and it is one that we should exercise."

The man who spoke those words, then-Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.), never shied away from exercising that responsibility—or from questioning the wisdom of presidents' appointments. He got into a number of scraps over Cabinet and sub-Cabinet nominations during his 24 years in the Senate—although none was as bitter as his own nomination to be secretary of defense has become.

Tower made his comments about the Senate's role 12 years ago during debate over President Jimmy Carter's nomination of Paul C. Warnke to become head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and chief SALT negotiator.

Tower opposed that nomination unsuccessfully—as he had done in several other cases. In January 1977, he opposed Carter's nomination of fellow-Texan Ray Marshall to be secretary of labor. During the Ford administration, he opposed the nomination of William J. Usery to be secretary of labor. And in 1963, he opposed the nomination of Paul H. Nitze to be secretary of the Navy.

Two factors generally guided Tower in his decision to oppose these various nominations: his belief that the Senate should use its own judgment—and ideology.

In Warnke's case, Tower thought the nominee was too liberal. He accused Warnke of "grievous errors in judgment" on U.S. weapons systems, and he said he feared Warnke would be even more mistaken in his judgments about Soviet weapon systems as a negotiator.

His opposition to Nitze in November 1963 was for similar reasons. Nitze was nominated by President John F. Kennedy and immediately ran into opposition on the Senate Armed Services Committee for views expressed in a 1960 California speech and the product of a 1958 conference in Cleveland. The battle is described by author Strobe Talbott in his book on Nitze, "The Master of the Game."

In the California speech, Nitze had suggested that the Strategic Air Command be put under the control of NATO and that the United Nations be given control over the use of nuclear weapons. Nitze attempted to explain his views to the committee, but was clearly on the defensive.

After Kennedy's assassination, President Lyndon B. Johnson pressed committee Chairman Richard Russell (D-Ga.) to bring the nomination to a vote. Tower was one of a handful of senators (including Republican Sen. Milward Simpson of Wyoming, the father of Senate Republican Whip Alan Simpson of Wyoming) who opposed Nitze.

Invoking his own service in the Navy, Tower said he opposed Nitze "because of his views on disarmament, his views on our military posture and his views on the disposition of the military forces."

Tower and Nitze eventually ended up on the same team, as part of President Ronald Reagan's arms control negotiation team in 1985-86.

Tower's longtime fight with organized labor led him to oppose Marshall in 1977 and Usery the year before. In Marshall's case, he spoke at length on the Senate floor about labor's influence in public policy and his fear that Marshall would simply be a rubber-stamp for its views.

"I hope to have a labor secretary who can view those issues more objectively and not from the official union point of view: who could advise the president in a more objective way," he said.

For a man now accused by some of his critics of being too close to the defense industry, that opposition to Marshall has a ring of irony.

PLACING A "CHECK" ON THE PRESIDENT

FRAMERS BELIEVED THE SENATE SHOULD SHARE APPOINTMENTS

(By Al Kamen)

It probably would not happen very often, Alexander Hamilton wrote 200 years ago, but it would happen every now and again that the Senate would reject a presidential nominee. That was not a bad thing, Hamilton said.

In fact, "it would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the president," Hamilton wrote in Federalist 76, "and would tend greatly to preventing the appointment of unfit characters . . . ."

Hamilton was not referring to the president's Cabinet because no idea of a Cabinet is in the Constitution. He was explaining the provision that gives the president the power to nominate officers of the government with the "advice and consent" of the Senate.

That provision in Article II of the Constitution, a compromise brokered 202 years ago, is at the heart of the controversy over former senator John G. Tower's embattled nomination to be secretary of defense.

Some of Tower's supporters have argued that the Senate has some sort of constitutional obligation to approve presidential nominees. But that view is based on tradition, rather than the Constitution or the debates involved in its ratification, according to experts.

Delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia believed strongly that certain powers should be shared by the Senate and the president, especially the appointment power. Throughout most of the convention, delegates held that the authority to appoint many high officials, including Supreme Court justices and ambassadors, should be retained exclusively by the Senate.

Late in the debates, those powers and the power to name "officers" was given to the president, but with the condition that they be subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. The delegates made no exception for Cabinet officers; neither did they establish up any criteria or offer any guidance for when a nominee should be rejected. Nothing in the original language would prevent the Senate from rejecting a nominee for any reason or no reason.

The notion of the Senate having appointment power may seem strange now, but many of the states apportioned authority that way at the time—the Virginia legislature still appoints judges—and the drafters drew on their experiences back home.

That "advice and consent" provision was not found in every draft of the Constitution and was not included in an earlier subcommittee report.

But after the language was later added, James Wilson, a delegate from Pennsylvania, tried on Sept. 7, 1787, to have the advice-and-consent clause removed, giving the president sole appointing authority across the board. Wilson said that the presidential responsibility for appointments would be "destroyed" by letting the Senate have a role.

But he was voted down. "As the president was to nominate, there would be responsibility," said Gouverneur Morris, "and as the Senate is to concur, there would be security." Morris, also from Pennsylvania, meant that the Senate would act as a check to ensure nominees were qualified.

The contours of the Tower battle are determined by politics, not by the Constitution, experts on both sides agree.

"Whenever I see a member of the Senate solemnly intone that there is a serious constitutional question involved here I have to laugh," said Duke Law School Prof. Walter Dellinger, a former adviser to Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee. "There is not a serious constitutional question that they may reject the president's choice. This is a question of prudence and policy."

Dellinger said that, as a policy matter, the Senate may consider both political philosophy and fitness when it reviews judicial nominees, but that, "as a practical matter, the president should have the final choice as to the political philosophy of his [Cabinet] appointees."

Gary McDowell, vice president of the conservative National Legal Center for the Public Interest, agreed that "a senator has a right to consider anything he wants" in assessing a nominee. "It is not inappropriate for the Senate to consider personal traits," he said.

Still, Hamilton was right in his prediction that it was "not very probable that [a president's] nomination would often be overruled"; the Senate has rejected only eight Cabinet nominees and only about a dozen Supreme Court nominees.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I had intended not even to speak on this nomination and certainly no minds are being made up. A lot of eloquent things have been said, a lot of acrimony on the floor, and certainly it is my firm belief right now that John Tower is not going to be confirmed. And I think the minds are made up.

As I say, one of the reasons that I had decided not to speak was because I am a trial lawyer, and I have always believed as I was taught in law school that everybody is innocent until proven guilty. When you are dealing with a man's life such as John Tower, as has been alluded to by the minority leader, it is always painful. I served with John Tower for 10 years. I never had any kind of a personal relationship with him. And we never saw each other socially. I never paid much attention to him on the floor except when we were engaged in debate.

It gives me no pleasure to talk about the problems of anybody that has a family. As a trial lawyer, I used to point to some poor defendant and say to the jury, "There, but for the grace of God, go you." It was a great trial technique. It worked.

But in this debate I hope most of the acrimony is over. Today I must say the comments have been much more civil in the attitudes by Senators on both sides of the aisle, and I think it reflects more credit on the Senate when we conduct ourselves in an open and honest way, not in a way impugning each other's motives constantly. But I will tell you this debate sounds to me like that old story about the politician who said, "They are telling a bunch of lies on me. What is worse, they are proving them."

You have one side saying that this report is just filled with unfounded rumors, unsubstantiated allegations and everything has been repudated. On this side of the aisle we say no, that is not true. They are not unfounded. They have not all been repudiated.

I will come back to that in just a moment. I want to start off by saying I have certainly supported every single nomination the President has sent over here, except this one, and I fully anticipate supporting a whole host more.

But I want to start by making a statement, not a defense of the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, the senior Senator from Georgia, Senator NUNN.

I started to have my staff go back and review the record and pick out all of the encomiums that have been delivered about this fine man since he has been in the Senate. He came 2 years before I did.

I believe that I can say almost from memory that in my 14 years in the Senate, every person on both sides of the aisle, at some time or another, has said that SAM NUNN is the most knowledgeable, he is the most purely motivated, he is the person without rancor, and he is the most knowledgeable man on defense issues and, above all, he is a man of absolutely unimpeachable integrity.

Now, what has changed? There has been plenty of character assassination around here, and it has not all been John Tower. Some of the unkindest cuts of all have been directed at the motivations—not the integrity, really, not the knowledge of the Senator from Georgia, but his motivation in opposing this nomination.

I will tell you what changed; two things: SAM NUNN's mind, during the course of the hearings, and, number two, his vote against John Tower in committee, which evoked all of this sudden outcry about a man from Georgia who before, and for 16 years in the Senate, was considered a man without peer in this body.

I know for a fact that SAM NUNN was strongly predisposed to vote for John Tower when his nomination was sent over here. Nobody has disagreed in this body with SAM NUNN, I believe, more than I have. I have argued with him privately in the Cloakroom, and I have debated with him on the floor of the Senate about what I saw as an unsustainable buildup of our defenses, to an unsustainable level. He knows that. We have honest differences on that. But as this committee began to do its work, these allegations started pouring in, especially about John Tower's drinking. It is my firm belief that this came as something of a surprise to the chairman of the committee, and the allegations just kept coming and kept coming.

Finally, it seems to me, John Tower had never made a conscious decision to stop what he called "excessive drinking." He made a conscious pledge to himself to do that and live with it, and he told the committee that he did drink to excess in the seventies, and yet many of the allegations did not just include the seventies; many of the allegations included the eighties. So, finally, the chairman, Senator NUNN, said that he could not vote for him. Probably like me, he might have been willing to roll the dice, if this were for Secretary of Labor or some other much less critical position which does not go right to the heart of the security of America.

So, Mr. President, I say to my colleagues, before they chastise Senator NUNN or impugn his motives again, let me ask them this question: Read the FBI report again, and then ask yourself, if you had had the responsibility of the chairmanship of that committee, and all those allegations were out there—not all of them repudiated, not all of them unfounded rumors, and some of them, indeed, very serious—if you had been in the chairman's responsibility, what would you have done, knowing tht if you voted for the nominee, he was probably going to come through here with about 20 or 25 no votes at most, but also knowing that most of those allegations over the next few months would almost certainly surface in the press and the evening news?

Ask yourself, if you were chairman of the committee, how you would feel, having put your stamp of approval on something as awesome as that nomination, and knowing that those allegations were going to make it into the public domain, and ask yourself even further, if you were chairman of that committee, what you would have done, knowing that these allegations were out there, with no really significant evidence that the problem we were talking about had been resolved. Ask yourself what you would have done, knowing that 3, 4, 5, 6 months down the pike there is going to be an attack in the Persian Gulf, an innocent airline shot down, or at 2 o'clock in the morning, a call, "Our computers show the Soviets have launched," and it might be false, or that the Libyans have attacked an American warship in the Mediterranean, and minds were not clear when that happened. Just ask yourself.

The minority leader asked us to put ourselves in the position of John Tower. I ask you to put yourself in the position of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, SAM NUNN, under the scenario that I just gave you. As I said, I think John Tower, being in the nuclear chair of command, was a paramount consideration.

The Senator from Rhode Island, I think, put a very fine point on excessive drinking by saying, "It is like excessive eating." I do not see it that way.

I read the same report he did, and I came to a different conclusion from the one he reached. On the floor of the Senate, he says, "Excessive drinking is not an alcohol problem. It is just like excessive eating." I do not see it what way, Mr. President.

Here are the statements; here is a chronology on that point.

February 1, open session, Armed Services Committee. Senator NUNN: "Do you have a drinking problem?"

"I have none, Senator. I am a man of some discipline."

February 26, "This Week With David Brinkley":

> Twelve years ago, I gave up spirits. I used to be a pretty good scotch drinker, and I gave that up. I haven't tasted scotch in 12 years, and after that I had only wine and perhaps an occasional martini, occasionally a little vodka with smoked salmon or caviar, something like that, but that was just occasionally. I really, essentially, have been a wine drinker, and now my only consumption is wine at meals. I don't drink unless I am eating.

"Face the Nation," March 5: "I am not alcohol dependent. I have admitted to excessive drinking in the 1970's, yes * * *" In response to Leslie Stahl's question: "Yes, but I have said excessive drinking, not alcohol abuse." Incidentally, that is another fine point. Leslie Stahl: "The story I have heard is that you promised your second wife you wouldn't drink anything but wine anymore. Then they asked you if you had kept that promise, and you said, 'Only when she was present.' Is that an accurate story?" Senator Tower: "No, it is not entirely accurate. I did, for the most part, express my intent to her, and I did, and since that time, I have been essentially a wine drinker, not a spirits drinker, only occasionally drinking of spirits. But I think that this sort of thing between man and wife is a two-way street."

No. 2, is the President entitled to his man? I promise you, Alexander Hamilton would be whirling in his grave if he heard some of the statements made on this floor about the President being entitled to his man. SAM NUNN did not believe that, and he voted against Paul Warnke. The minority leader, Senator DOLE, does not believe that. He voted against Paul Warnke. John Tower does not believe that. He voted against Paul Warnke, as well as a host of others.

I do not want this to sound self-serving, but I am proud of it: I do not give the President an awful lot of weight on his nominees. All things being equal, if a man is qualified, sure. James Watt came to see me in my office, and I visited with him about 10 or 15 minutes, and that is just how long it took me to make up my mind that I was not going to vote for him.

I led the charge, incidentally—and I want that on my epitaph—against James Watts' nomination and got 11 big votes, and the argument that defeated me so overwhelmingly was that the President is entitled to his man.

If we had taken the same vote on James Watt 2 years later, he would not have gotten 11 yes votes.

This is an awesome responsibility, I say to my colleagues, that our Founding Fathers put on us.

You go back and read the Federalist Papers. Here is what Hamilton said:

> There is nothing so apt to agitate the passions of mankind as personal considerations, whether they relate to ourselves or to others who are to be the objects of our choice or preference.

And in Federalist Paper No. 76, Hamilton said:

> The rejection of a Presidential nominee "would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President. It would be an efficacious source of stability in the administration.

The Senate has denied the President his choice thousands of times in the last 20 years, usually not by a vote of rejection but by inaction, just refusing to act on it.

Where were the "President-should-have-his-man" people on those nominees? There were over 13,000 nominations which died during Jimmy Carter's administration alone. And so many times someone says, "We can't bring that nomination up because Senator so-and-so has a hold on it."

But the point I want to make is the Founding Fathers debated this issue extensively when they put the advise-and-consent clause in the Constitution. If you can find in there where it says the President is entitled to his man, I will vote for John Tower and everyone else the President sends over here.

Every word in that Constitution is sacred to this Senator and, if you read the Federalist Papers and Madison's history of the Constitutional Convention, you will see that those words on the Senate's advise and consent role were put in there after great deliberation and debate, and I take that responsibility very seriously.

Third, that infamous FBI report—it takes hours to read and I must say most of it is dull, boring stuff, repetitious. It belongs to President Bush. It is his property. I can see both sides of the argument on this. The Republicans say he is unfairly accused. Senator after Senator said, "I want justice for my friend; I want fairness for my friend."

We have to stand here and say, "We are giving him justice."

"You are? Then tell us why you are opposed to him."

"Well, we can't." You cannot, even as one Senator said, take notes in S-407 and walk out with those notes.

It is unfair to John Tower in a sense but it is also my understanding that the chairman of the Armed Services Committee asked Senator Tower, "Do you want to confront your accusers? We will bring them in." John Tower said that he did not care to do that.

Those who say they know others who oppose this nomination must remain silent on why they oppose him.

I try to be as judicious and circumspect as I can even in private conversation about this because I so strongly believe in the rights of every individual. The thing that makes our Constitution stand out, the thing that makes us the greatest living democracy, is that document. If you are going to sum up in one sentence what the Constitution says, it would be, "Each one of us counts."

Madison wanted to provide the maximum individual liberty to people in this country commensurate with making sure the majority did not run roughshod over the minority. Sometimes you have to chuckle when people say: "Well, I don't understand. A democracy means a majority rules."

That is not what a democracy means. A majority of the people in my beloved South, 95 percent, thought slavery was fine. And for almost 100 years after the Civil War we thought it was fine for black children to go to separate schools. That was never right. It was never fair.

As I said a moment ago, I was a trial lawyer for 18 years before I got into politics and I have tried some, and you know it is an interesting thing talking about some of the personal attacks across this aisle. We used to stand there and scream at each other in front of the jury and go out and have lunch together, and everybody thought some kind of deal was being cut. We were advocates. We were advocates for our clients and what we did in front of our jury did not bother our personal relationships one whit. And I suspect all these wounds will heal. They were unnecessary, but they will heal.

But in the 18 years I tried lawsuits, I learned to evaluate testimony, too. I used to read deposition after deposition without seeing the person who was being deposed and, when you get all that experience under your belt, you evaluate it and you can pretty well tell who is telling the truth and who is not. I never tried a lawsuit that did not have two sides to it. That is what lawsuits are about—one person standing up solemnly swearing to tell the truth and telling it and someone else who took the same oath telling a 180-degree different story.

All I am saying is I have had a little experience in evaluating testimony, weighing it, determining people's credibility. And when people say to me as I read that report that it is nothing but unfounded rumors and unsubstantiated allegations, and every one of them have been shot down, I want to say that you did not read the same report I read. And even if you did, I have a right to my conclusions just as anyone else in this body does. They are my own. I did not ask another Senator for his advice or his thoughts about it. I read the report for myself and I reached my own conclusions, and every Senator in this body not only has a right but a duty to do the same thing, and he has the right not to have his motives impugned once he has honestly done that.

As I started to say a moment ago, I just simply cannot hope and pray that if this man is confirmed, that all minds will be clear in case of a crisis. I am not willing to roll the dice. I have absolutely no personal animosity for or unkind feelings toward John Tower. But I do not really believe he has been treated all that unfairly.

I think some of the acrimony here has been unfair. Every statement, it seems to me, for the past 2 weeks has been to evoke some kind of sharp ad hominem personal attack on somebody else.

Mr. President, for those reasons and others which I will not belabor, I intend to vote "no" on John Tower's nomination.

The minority leader said, it is not just getting another name. Yet it is. If we reject John Tower, the President has to send another name, and I promise you that some of these arguments here and personal attacks will be forgotten. I regret and I am sincerely sorry for the scars that will be left on John Tower either way. But that is the way it is, and I hope that they will heal with time and I hope because there are no minds yet to be made up that we can vote on this nomination and get it over with.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

(Several Senators addressed the Chair.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to recognize the acting Republican leader, the Senator from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, there is a time for deliberation and there is a time for debate. And there is also a time for decision, and whether it be fair or unjust or whether it is based on files rather than facts, on the weight of allegations rather than on the weight of evidence, on loyalty to a party or to a President rather than loyalty to due process, whether it is based on polls or perceptions rather than the unwritten but well known principle of fair play, there is a time to decide, and I believe that time is very near if not quite here at this point.

There should be no confusion about what the Republicans are seeking to do. We are looking for what I would call five tough pieces, five members of the Democratic Party who are willing to say that the President is entitled to have his Cabinet choice confirmed unless there is clear convincing evidence that the nominee is unqualified, unworthy, or unfit to hold that office. Three have declared their intent to support John Tower. We are looking for two more.

It should come as no surprise that there may be some Democratic Members who would look to support President Bush and John Tower provided he loses, enabling them to gain the good will of the White House while engendering no ill will with their colleagues. And there may be some Republican Members who would like to vote with John Tower provided he wins and vote no if it is clear he is going to lose. That is nothing new to any of us. Each of us is constantly called upon to weigh loyalty to party, to Presidents, to friendship, to constituents, to principle in reaching our decisions.

Now, two of the five Democrats that the Republicans hope will support the President and his nominee are freshmen. They have been here only 2 months and it is not going to be an easy decision for them.

While they are troubled by the process involved in the judging of John Tower, they are also under pressure from their constituents, who have read no evidence but hold very strong opinions. They are under pressure generated by the thought of cutting against the grain of the majority of their own party—the majority leader, the former majority leader, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who holds the respect of all of us. They are necessarily concerned with their future within their party if they vote for President Bush's nominee.

I can only say to those Senators that I have been there before. It is not a pleasant experience. There are doubts that always flutter inside during those solitary moments. It requires you to ask why you came here, what you hope to accomplish, what you hope to do, and who you hope to remain.

It has been said that all mirrors are magical because they never reveal ourselves. And while the mirror may distort and flatter, there is a voice inside that no one else can hear that whispers to us the truth about ourselves. There is that "small circle of pain within the skull that must tramp and tread one endless round of thought to justify our actions to ourselves."

I have been there before and I have known that small circle of pain. I cannot offer any comfort to those freshmen Members, other than saying that you were not sent here to make easy decisions, because anyone can do that. You were not sent here to put a wet finger in the wind to determine the direction of public opinion, because anyone can do that. You were sent to search for the truth, to exercise judgment, to answer to the voice inside, the voice that no one else can hear.

Now, that is not going to be easy for those who still hold doubts about the fairness of the process, about the weight of the allegations and, indeed, the weightlessness of the evidence.

Last week, Senator Tower gave a sterling performance before the National Press Club, discussing substance, exhibiting style. And yet the headline in one of my papers back home read "Tower Admits Infidelity" in bold print. And inside it, in slightly smaller print, it said: "Cohen Supports Tower."

And I could see the political opponents sharpening the long knives on the whetstone of a nasty headline. And I have had reporters come down from Maine this week, as a matter of fact several are in town, asking why am I defending John Tower; why risk my reputation for a man who carries so much heavy baggage and, besides, is he not going to lose?

Well, it is possible. John Tower may lose this fight. I hope not. But the Senate can claim no victory; no laurel wreaths can be worn if he should.

But why, do I risk my reputation for him? Well, because I know him; because I admire what he has done and tried to do for his country; because I think he has much to offer, just as he has offered much; because I am offended by the way in which he has been mugged by those who purport to be disinterested, who claim to have no motive to lie but, in fact, have lied.

Now, the majority of the committee made much of the fact that the FBI file—and I stress the word "file" and not "report"—contains allegations of misconduct by those who have no known motive to lie. How do we know about motives? How do we judge motives? Many of those witnesses whose statements are contained in the FBI files are still unidentified. How do we determine motivation?

There are a number of witnesses who are identified who give specific times, and places and dates of alleged misconduct. In several instances their names were reported in the newspapers. We had in the Washington Post the name of a man involved in that so-called Russian ballerina story; we had the name of a man who claimed that Tower was inebriated during a visit to a base in Texas; we had the name of an Arizona businessman who claimed that Tower made three phantom visits to the Jefferson Hotel. All of those stories were leaked to members of the press.

The question I have to ask is: Why did not those who engaged in this insidious tactic ever disclose the background of those making those charges? Why was that never disclosed or reported in the press? Why was it not disclosed to the American people that the so-called disinterested Arizona businessman was a Democratic pollster or, should I say, a pollster for the Democrats?

Just because a person has a political bias, it does not necessarily mean that he was not telling the truth or that he was not mistaken. But would it not have at least raised some concern of objectivity, of disinterestedness? Would it not have been an important factor for Democrats to know if a well-known Republican pollster made allegations against a member of their party? Would they have not raised questions? Yet, nothing was said about that.

Now, much has been said about appearances—the appearance of damaging statements by those who "appeared" to be disinterested. Shelley once said that poets are the true legislators of the world. Of course, Shelley had a conflict of interest, or, I should say, by today's standard, the appearance of a conflict of interest.

Last week, I quoted from "Murder in the Cathedral." I was hoping there might be something in there that I could cite that would help us in the discovery of truth about ourselves. Archbishop Thomas Beckett had angered the king and the king's knights went off to chase him down and they murdered him in a cathedral. I went through and reread that again because it contained a wonderful summation by the four knights who committed the act of murder.

The third knight in justifying his act, said the following:

* * * I might as well say it at once. It is this: in what we have done, and whatever you may think of it, we have been perfectly disinterested. [The other KNIGHTS: 'Hear! Hear! '.] We are not getting anything out of this. We have much more to lose than to gain. We are four plain Englishmen who put our country first.

And it goes on to say: "When you come to the point, it does go against the grain to kill an archbishop."—call it a Cabinet nominee, instead—"especially when you have been brought up in good church" or "Senate"—"traditions."

I am awfully sorry about it. We realized this was our duty but all the same we had to work ourselves up to it. * * * King Henry—God bless him—will have to say, for reasons of state, that he never meant this to happen; and there is going to be an awful row; * * * I had a tremendous admiration for him—you must have noticed what a good show he put up at the end—they won't give us any glory. No, we have done for ourselves, there's no mistake about that. So, as I said at the beginning, please give us at least the credit for being completely disinterested in this business. I think that is about all I have to say.

The fourth knight went on.

Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. COHEN. I do not intend to go into the fourth knight of the evening, but it will take me about another 15 or 20 minutes.

The fourth knight replied:

He—

Thomas Beckett—

He used every means of provocation; from his conduct, step by step, there can be no inference except that he had determined upon a death by martyrdom. Even at the last, he could have given us reason: you have seen how he evaded our questions. And when he had deliberately exasperated us beyond human endurance, he could still have easily escaped; he could have kept himself from us long enough to allow our righteous anger to cool. That was just what he did not wish to happen; he insisted, while we were still inflamed with wrath, that the doors should be opened. Need I say more? I think, with these facts before you, you will unhesitatingly render a verdict of Suicide while Unsound Mind. It is the only charitable verdict you can give, upon one who was, after all, a great man.

Well, John Tower could have withdrawn. He could have barred the doors of the Senate. He could have saved himself from the wrath of those disinterested knights who had done him in. He could have barred those doors. But, even knowing how angry the Senate was, he insisted upon a vote and does insist upon a vote, refusing to submit to a process that is so, in my judgment, palpably unfair.

Last night, following the deliberations, the debate, Senator RUDMAN and I went down to the Monocle Restaurant, I must say with great trepidation. That restaurant has nearly achieved the prominence of the Watergate Hotel. Business appeared to be up last night. Maybe they were hoping to see what activity might take place at that restaurant.

There was a table of about a dozen men and, as I recall, one woman. Their voices were loud. There was a great deal of laughter, some of it boisterous. Cocktails were being served. They were having a good time.

Mr. President, they were also quite sober. I might point out that they happened to be, coincidentally, from Maine and New Hampshire, unbeknownst to Senator RUDMAN and myself at the time. But I thought about the situation. I thought, suppose someone in that restaurant was offended by loud laughter or a group of people enjoying cocktails before their meal. They could say that in their judgment these people were under the influence of alcohol or were engaging in conduct that was unbecoming.

And what if a Member of the U.S. Senate happened to be sitting at the table at that time? Could the same charge not be made?

I thought about my own appearance. I had three drinks in less than 15 minutes. Ice water. Three glasses of ice water. And the thought occurred to me, suppose someone sitting at a distant table watched me swallow three glasses of water and they concluded that it may have been gin or vodka instead of Perrier or Poland Spring Water, preferably, from Maine.

And some haloed soul, who was sitting over at that distant table who only enters the Monocle to eat and observe other people, came to that conclusion. And, if I laughed too loud at one of Senator RUDMAN'S stories or jokes or appeared off balance, as I struggled to get from the table that was fairly tight, how should I presume? How should I presume that my conduct would be construed at a later time?

Would I one day find Rumor, that ancient bird with an eye under every feather, had recorded by condition; saved it up for 15 years and 1 day in a moral frenzy, declared that I saw Senator COHEN, I saw Senator RUDMAN, under the influence of alcohol at the Monocle? I saw them touch the Devil.

Hypothetically preposterous? Is this the product of deliberately induced paranoia?

Karen Elliott House—remember her name, Mr. President. A rumor persisted for 17 years because John Tower invited her and her colleagues for jazz and eggs, following a banquet 17 years ago. And her article appeared in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. It was entered in the RECORD. I will not take the time to do it at this point.

She was asked to respond anonymously to an anonymous rumor. She was invited to provide damaging information under the security blanket of secrecy.

It this what the Senate has come to? Is this what Justinian meant about giving every man his due?

Yesterday the senior Senator from Arizona cited a retired general who opposed John Tower. I believe it was General Graham. Fair enough. Fair enough. But let us weigh it. Let us weigh General Graham's opinion of John Tower against the weight of Gen. P.X. Kelley. He was cited yesterday; Gen. Bennie Davis, Admiral Holloway. Let me read to you what they had to say about John Tower. We have heard that John Tower simply cannot serve as a role model for the men and women in our military.

At a press conference General Kelley, Admiral Holloway, and Admiral Davis all appeared and this is what they had to say:

As a matter of fact, I've supported John Tower for the position of Secretary of Defense ever since we asked the Republican Administration as a possibility. I supported him because of his intellect, his intelligence, integrity, his experience, and his toughness.

I was delighted when President Bush nominated him for the position of Secretary of Defense. I have to say that I've become shocked and disillusioned and outraged at the slanderous allegations that have jeopardized his nomination. I've never seen John Tower under the influence of liquor, I've never seen John Tower conduct himself with impropriety toward a woman. I'm absolutely convinced he is in every respect, the best qualified person today to serve as our secretary of defense. And I'm here right now to offer my full support on John Tower's behalf because I frankly consider it to be my public duty. Thank you.

That is the former commandant of the Marine Corps.

General Davis, said at this press conference:

I am shocked to read some of the allegations, I am shocked to hear of those allegations, because in my over 20 years of intimate, knowledge of John Tower's behavior I consider John Tower a moral man, a man of great integrity, and certainly the finest candidate to be secretary of defense of any person that I've know over the last 35 years.

That is General Davis.

A question was put to General Kelley by the press:

Q. General Kelley, it appears that by organizing this news conference that you talked to either John Tower or the White House and coordinated in some way what you're doing, and with that they're doing in support of Tower.

General KELLEY. The only three people I talked to to put together this news conference, with the exception of calling the Associated Press and UPI, the only three people I talked to are the two gentleman who are up here with me, and Julie who reserved the room for me, which by the way, all three of us are paying for.

Finally, Admiral Holloway:

From the perspective of the military, I think we are saying we have quite a different view than the present Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and we're up here to tell you that, that we think our view is important and that you should hear it.

My colleague and good friend from Maine wants to know if I am engaging in filibuster. I want to assure him that I am not. I was so inspired by Senator BUMPERS' eloquence that I felt that I should say a few words on behalf of Senator Tower.

I, furthermore, have been so inspired by my colleague's energized activity in the last day or so that I felt that in fairness, I should at least offer some balance to the debate.

So I ask, Mr. President, that the comments by General Kelley, Admiral Halloway, and General Davis be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

General P.X. KELLEY. Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. First, I would like to thank you very much for being here on such short notice. I'm P.X. Kelley, former Commandant of the United States Marine Corps. With me are Admiral James Holloway, former Chief of Naval Operations and was also a member of the very prestigious Packard Commission and General Bennie Davis, former Commander in Chief, Strategic Air Command and who I have officially known over two decades.

First, I'd like to read a telegram that was sent to our Commander in Chief, the President, this past Wednesday—copies of which I have given you.

To the President:

We have served as Generals and Flag Officers in the Armed Forces of the United States.

We commanded the military forces upon whose successful performance the security of the American people depends.

We know John Tower well, and have known him for many years.

In our relationships with John Tower, we have found him to be superbly qualified in every respect, both professionally and personally, to serve the Nation as Secretary of Defense and in the chain-of-command. We would be honored to serve under him, and the uniformed men and women of our country would unquestionably benefit from his leadership.

We strongly support your nomination of this exceptional American.

This telegram was signed by 19 retired Generals and Admirals, and I'd just like to quickly run through their names to give you a flavor of just who they were.

General Robert H. Barrow, USMC (Ret.). My predecessor as Commandant of the Marine Corps, an exceptional combat hero in three wars.

General Richard E. Cavasos, USA (Ret.). A very, very well respected member of the Hispanic community.

General Bennie L. Davis, USAF (Ret.). Standing to my left who I have mentioned as former Commander in Chief of our Strategic Air Command.

General Raymond G. Davis, USMC (Ret.). Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps, a resident of the State of Georgia, and Medal of Honor winner from Korea.

I've known John Tower since 1974, and I would keep the same elaborations that appeared regularly before the Armed Services Committee to testify. And from that time I was impressed with John Tower's ability as a member of that Armed Services Committee. After my retirement, I maintained an association with John Tower. I consider myself a good friend, and my respect for his abilities, his leadership, has grown as I have observed him as Chairman of the Armed Services Committee. As a matter of fact, I've supported John Tower for the position of Secretary of Defense ever since we asked the Republican Administration as a possibility. I supported him because of his intellect, his intelligence, integrity, his experience, and his toughness. I was delighted when President Bush nominated him for the position of Secretary of Defense. I have to say that I've become shocked and disillusioned and outraged at the slanderous allegations that have jeopardized his nomination. I've never seen John Tower under the influence of liquor, I've never seen John Tower conduct himself with impropriety toward a woman. I'm absolutely convinced he is in every respect, the best qualified person today to serve as our secretary of defense. And I'm here right now to offer my full support on John Tower's behalf because I frankly consider it to be my public duty. Thank you.

General DAVIS. I too have known John Tower for many, many years. I first encountered John Tower back in 1968 when I was flying combat in southeast Asia. John Tower, who I am sure most of you know, made one of his many trips to southeast Asia to provide that [inaudible] presence among the troops who were then deployed and in combat. I have known John Tower for over more than 20 years, very closely, when I headed Air Force Personnel and John Tower as a Senator provided the necessary support for all of our people programs. He was one of the first spokesman to increase the use of women in the service, and in particularly the United States Air Force. At the Air Force Training Command, which is headquartered in Texas, San Antonio, Texas, and its base structure is in Texas across the southeast, John Tower made many, many visits to my bases. I have never seen John Tower inebriated. I have never seen John Tower on anything but on his best behavior. John Tower is an example, an example that should be followed by all of us. When I was Commander in Chief of the Strategic Air Command, John Tower was mightily interested in the strategic nuclear deterrence of this nation. I can say without reservation, it would be my pleasure to serve in a command chain that had John Tower in it. I don't think there's any question about his superb intellect, in what he brings to the job, with his great knowledge of foreign affairs, with his great knowledge of nuclear matters, and with his great knowledge of alliances throughout the world. I am shocked to read some of the allegations, I am shocked to hear of those allegations, because in my over 20 years of intimate, knowledge of John Tower's behavior I consider John Tower a moral man, a man of great integrity, and certainly the finest candidate to be secretary of defense of any person that I've known over the last 35 years.

Thank you very much.

General KELLEY. We'd be very happy right now to take any questions that you would like to ask of any of us.

Q. What effect do you think the delay and controversy is having on the Pentagon now, and what lingering damage?

Admiral HOLLOWAY. I don't believe that. As a matter of fact, I don't believe that because as we all know, he is participating in policy discussions, in budget discussions, and full discussions with the Pentagon and laying out the policies that have been enunciated by the President.

Q. Do any of you feel that even if he wins this battle and is confirmed, the Pentagon's budget fight [inaudible] victims would be damaged because they would have a wounded Secretary of Defense

General KELLEY. Absolutely not, John Tower is not wounded by anybody or anything. John Tower is a very strong, very tough individual, and John Tower will lead the Department of Defense with leadership that will be unparalleled.

Q. Let me just add that there seems to be a feeling that this would be John Tower's budget?

General KELLEY. This is the President's budget. This is the President's program. John Tower as Secretary of Defense is responsible for enunciating that program to the Congress and he already is aware of the President's positions, his priorities, and is well prepared to carry that message forward.

Q. General Kelley, it appears that by organizing this news conference that you talked to either John Tower or the White House and coordinated in some way what you're doing, and with what they're doing in support of Tower.

General KELLEY. The only three people I talked to, to put together this news conference, with the exception of calling the Associated Press and UPI, the only three people I talked to are the two gentlemen who are up here with me, and Julie who reserved the room for me, which by the way, all three of us are paying for.

General DAVIS. I think that there is some indication that we had no prior coordination is the fact that the President's Press Secretary is speaking at the same time.

Q. Gentlemen, how do you view the current Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee's position that John Tower is unfit to serve in a chain of command?

General DAVIS. Well, we certainly disagree with that position, but everybody is entitled to their own views, and we all know and respect Senator Nunn. I've known Senator Nunn for at least ten years, and have appeared before him many, many times in hearings, but we disagree on that point. We think that John Tower is the best qualified person that we know of to be secretary of defense.

Admiral HOLLOWAY. Let me point out that we're coming before you as experienced military leaders. I, for example, during the period that I was head of the Navy, served under three secretaries of defense. I believe that I have an appreciation for the requirements of that job, and I also consider that I have an understanding of what it takes to make that job effective. From the perspective of the military, I think we are saying we have quite a different view than the present Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and we're up here to tell you that, that we think our view is important and that you should hear it.

Q. Gentlemen, I got here late, but if in fact you believe that some of the allegations against Mr. Tower, including his excessive drinking in the 70's and 80's, was solid enough, would you then have questions about him being in a position of—a chain of command—in terms of the nuclear aspect.

General KELLEY. You're asking a real hypothetical question. What we have said, and you did indeed come in late, we said we have 19 General Officers and Admirals who have never seen John Tower under the influence of alcohol.

Q. You still didn't answer the question sir, would someone with an alcoholic problem, or is shown to have one, be unfit based on what you know the military code to be, to be in a position—chain of command—dealing with nuclear weapons?

General DAVIS. I probably had the most direct experience with nuclear weapons over 14 years, four of those as Commander in Chief Strategic Air Command. We had said, and we reiterate, we have no problem with John Tower in a leadership position, no problem with John Tower in the chain of command. John Tower is a man of great integrity, great morals, great honesty and we think he is the best man for the job.

That's it. That's all.

General KELLEY. Thank you all very much.

MARCH 6, 1989.

Hon. WILLIAM S. COHEN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR COHEN: Last Wednesday, 19 retired Generals and Admirals from the Army, Navy, Air Forces, and Marine Corps, all of whom have known the Honorable John Tower for many years, forwarded a telegram to the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, strongly supporting the nomination for Secretary of Defense of this exceptional American. I believe that this act is unprecedented in the history of our Country, and have attached a copy of the text for your examination.

I have known Senator Tower professionally, socially, and personally for over a decade, and one of my sincerest regrets is that I retired before having an opportunity to serve under him while he is our Secretary of Defense. It is my strong conviction that history will identify him as one of the greatest patriots and statesmen of our generation.

I urge you to judge Senator Tower on his unique professional qualification to lead our defense establishment. The young men and women who today are serving in the uniform of their Country deserve to have John Tower at the helm.

I am sending this same letter to all members of the United States Senate.

With warmest best wishes, I am.

Most respectfully,

P.X. KELLEY,
General, U.S. Marine Corps (Ret.) 28th Commandant of the Marine Corps.

ATTACHMENT

Text of a telegram sent to the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces by 19 retired senior officers on March 1, 1989, in support of the Honorable John Tower for Secretary of Defense.

"To the President:

"We have served as General and Flag Officers in the Armed Forces of the United States.

"We commanded the military forces upon whose successful performance the security of the American people depends.

"We know John Tower well, and have known him for many years.

"In our relationships with John Tower, we have found him to be superbly qualified in every respect, both professionally and personally, to serve the Nation as Secretary of Defense and in the chain-of-command. Signed:

General Robert H. Barrow, USMC (Ret.), former Commandant of the Marine Corps.

General Richard E. Cavazos, USA (Ret.), former Commanding General, Forces Command.

General Bennie L. Davis, USAF (Ret.), former Commander-in-Chief, Strategic Air Command.

General Raymond G. Davis, USMC (Ret.), former Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps and Medal of Honor recipient.

General Charles A. Gabriel, USAF (Ret.), Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

Admiral Thomas B. Hayward, USN (Ret.), former Chief of Naval Operations.

Lt. Gen. James F. Hollingsworth, USA (Ret.), former Commanding General, 1 Corps, Korea.

Admiral James L. Holloway III, USN (Ret.), former Chief of Naval Operations.

General Samuel Jaskilka, USMC (Ret.), former Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps.

General Paul X. Kelley, USMC (Ret.), former Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Admiral George E.R. Kinnear II, USN (Ret.), former U.S. Representative, NATO Military Committee.

General William A. Knowlton, USA (Ret.), former U.S. Representative, NATO Military Committee.

Admiral Wesley L. McDonald, USN (Ret.), former Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic and Commander-in-Chief, Atlantic.

General Bryce Poe, USAF (Ret.), former Commander, Air Force Logistics Command.

General John Roberts USAF (Ret.), former Commander, Air Training Command.

Lt. General Thomas R. Stafford, USAF (Ret.), former Astronaut.

General William C. Westmoreland, USA (Ret.), former Chief of Staff of the Army.

General Louis H. Wilson, USMC (Ret.), former Commandant of the Marine Corps and Medal of Honor recipient.

Admiral Elmo R. Zumwalt, Jr., USN (Ret.), former Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. COHEN. The Democratic majority cites not one shred of evidence, and I say this to my colleague, a former judge, not one shred of evidence that John Tower has ever discriminated against or in any way abused any staff member. There is not a shred of evidence in any record, any file, any report to that effect.

Yet the committee report concludes that the Members are concerned that he would not treat women in the military fairly.

I want to weigh the total absence of evidence, admittedly the total absence of evidence, against a letter that I am now going to offer in the RECORD. It is dated March 7 and I will read it. Not all the names, just the letter.

DEAR SENATOR: We are staff members who have worked for Senator John Tower during his 30 years of public service. We have had unequalled opportunities to observe his personal and professional conduct, and we believe our experiences with him are relevant to the current debate. We know John Tower very well.

John Tower is a man of honor, integrity, discipline and courage. The son and grandson of Methodist ministers, he is a principled man of uncommon talents and extraordinary character. He is a workaholic—not an alcoholic.

Three times in the past four years John Tower has answered the call of Presidents to serve his country. Though he ended his distinguished Senate career with modest financial resources, he was willing twice to leave his private firm to further serve our nation. John Tower's entire career has exemplified a willingness to place public service above financial gain.

We write to you out of respect and affection for John Tower. In deciding how you will vote on his nomination we encourage you to ask: Could the man described by his critics as an abuser of alcohol, a "womanizer" and an unprincipled businessman retain the loyalty, admiration and respect of so many of his former employees—so many who know him so well?

John Tower is eminently qualified in all respects to serve as Secretary of Defense. We urge you to permit John Tower to continue to serve his country.

It is signed, I would guess, by at least 150 past members of his staff.

I ask unanimous consent it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, some Members of the majority cite public opinion polls as evidence that John Tower does not hold the confidence of the American people. To that I can only say, if you dump garbage on a man for 2 months and then take a poll asking people whether they are offended by the odor, it should come as no surprise that 56 percent of the people say they are. But that is exactly what has taken place during the past 2 months with leak after leak after leak.

The majority leader this morning cited this article that has been printed in the RECORD that appeared in today's Washington Post how John Tower has voted no in the past against several nominees for positions in an administration. The majority leader is now saying John Tower is asking for a different standard to be applied to him than he applied to others.

That is not how I read this article. That is not how I interpret what John Tower did. John Tower voted no on two or three occasions based on deep philosophical opposition to the nominees. On one occasion, Mr. President, he joined not a partisan onslaught against Mr. Warnke; he joined Scoop Jackson. It was Scoop Jackson, a Democratic leader, who led the effort against Paul Warnke. It was based on a deep philosophical opposition to the positions adopted by Mr. Warnke and others.

That is consistent with what Anthony Lewis wrote about in the New York Times last week. That is consistent with what the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has stated, JOSEPH BIDEN, who is offended by the process by which we rely upon FBI files in order to reach our judgment.

If you are going to oppose him on philosophy, say so, but let us not do it on the basis of unconfirmed, uncorroborated unexamined, uncross-examined statements to the FBI.

What we have is opinion, not based on facts, based on files, raw, unevaluated, uncross-examined statements. We cannot point to the weight of the evidence; we can only point to the weight of the allegations.

I listened with great interest to my colleague from Arkansas. He is a distinguished Member of the Senate, a gifted orator, a gifted trial lawyer by all accounts, and he said he had tried cases for 18 years, many times basing his judgment just on reading depositions. Well, I have to ask a question, Mr. President, another student of the law: Why is it that a court of appeals never reverses on a finding of fact but only on a point of law? Why is it the courts never reverse on a factual finding, only on a point of law? Because the jury observed the witnesses. You cannot tell from a printed page whether someone is lying or mistaken or malicious or mad. With all due respect to my colleague from Arkansas, a great trial lawyer, I have read another great trial lawyer, Louis Nizer, one of the best in this century.

Louis Nizer had a chapter in the book worth reading, "How To Tell A Liar." You have to observe a witness, that is what Mr. Nizer says. You have to look at body language when you observe that witness as to whether he appears to be truthful, forthcoming and candid, or whether he is uncomfortable in the chair, and whether that discomfort is due to just nervousness or whether he is trying to conceal something, hide something, or distort something. Body language.

The eyes, Mr. President, are said to be the windows into the soul. They can be the site of confusion or dishonesty or candor. We have to look at the eyes.

And how about speech? Is it halting? Is it calculating? Is it just nervousness?

Finally, about sincerity. Nizer says, looking at the totality of the body language, the eyes, the speech, the mannerisms, sincerity. He says that character is the letter of credit written on the face. Character is the letter of credit written on the face. That is how we determine whether someone is telling the truth or lying or is simply wrong.

We had two witnesses—two witnesses—against John Tower appear before us in public. None of the others appeared before the full committee. None. Maybe we were lax and did not press hard enough. I must tell you, at the conclusion of Mr. Weyrich's and Mr. Jackson's testimony, I heard my colleagues say to the press, "I haven't heard anything here that will stand up in a court of law," and I agreed. Of course, now we are told we are not a court of law, we are just the U.S. Senate. So maybe we were lax in not pressing further.

Mr. President, I am defending John Tower for all the reasons I have cited in the past few moments, but more than John Tower, I am defending something called due process, that intangible concept that embodies the very soul of the American way, that unwritten but unmistakable rule of fair play.

I am defending the right of any individual, each one of us, anyone who wants to come into public service, not to be stabbed in the dark by hooded men and women who wish to leave no fingerprints.

I am defending us against a process which minimizes our personal experiences and observations and gives great weight to the unsworn, the unidentified, the uncross-examined.

I am defending against a moving ecclesiastical finger that points in every direction but our own.

Mr. President, one of our Members has stated that if John Tower is rejected, he will amount to little more than a footnote in our history books. Maybe so. Few of us will be more than footnotes in the long tally of time, but the manner by which we have conducted his confirmation proceedings and charged him with being unfit for high office I believe will remain an indelible stain upon the pages of the Senate's Journal. It is my fervent hope we will not commit this injustice. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I do not recommend that my colleagues wait late in the process of a confirmation to declare their opinions. I have done so only because I have been, up until now, undecided. Frankly, I hoped that like Saul on the road to Damascus a shaft of light might come down on this case and make it clear. I hoped to find vivid hues of black and white from the evidence which would convince me beyond a reasonable doubt. I had hoped to gain the same kind of convictions that some of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have about this case—to be able to get out with great feeling and argue one way or the other on this case. I thought perhaps that would happen to me.

It has not, Mr. President. I see this case in dull hues of gray where the evidence is not clear, where the evidence is troubling, but not shocking. Indeed, I think even the White House found it troubling. It took them a month to resolve their own concerns about this nomination. They made their decision, but, nevertheless, Mr. President, it is a troubling case.

There are three bases for challenging Senator Tower. First, ethics. Frankly, Mr. President, the ethics part is troubling to me, but Senator Tower did nothing illegal. Indeed, it does not violate any existing ethical standard and ethical considerations have been very much on the mind of this Congress. With all our attention on ethics, if Senator Tower's behavior violated no ethical standard then it seems to me we should not deny him the position of Secretary of Defense on that basis. Perhaps this year we will articulate a more clear, more discernible, a more consistent standard to which we can all adhere.

There has been a charge of womanizing, Mr. President. I think the committee, as I read their report, did not take that seriously. At least they did not take that as the basis for their judgment. Indeed, the word I found was "indiscretions."

I tend to take the same attitude toward that that the committee did, Mr. President, believing that Senator Tower's actions constitute indiscretions. I would personally not deny Senator Tower an appointment based upon those indiscretions. I think they are relevant, though, Mr. President, from the standpoint of what they say about his ability to handle alcohol. It is on the alcohol issue that I find serious question.

There are three things about the evidence. I guess we would call it the evidence. Certainly it is not legal evidence. It was not adduced in a court of law. It was not subject to cross-examination. It was not there to be judged by a judge nor subject to legal objections. But, Mr. President, it is nevertheless a formidable body of evidence. Some evidence is not even in the record—phone calls that come in. Indeed, just yesterday in my office a phone call came in, from a person who claimed to have personally observed two incidents involving Senator Tower. And I realize it is somewhat unfair to even say that, and I would not do so on the floor if the die was not cast on this issue. But it has influenced me because I talked to the person who described two separate events.

With respect to the alcohol, the formidable body of evidence shows this. First, frequency in the use of alcohol. Second, consumption of great quantities of alcohol—that is, drunkenness as opposed to simply regular drinking. And third, and most important, Mr. President, is a change in conduct when using alcohol or when abusing alcohol.

Now, by that I mean, Mr. President, the evidence indicates that a personality change occurs in Senator Tower when he abuses alcohol. This personality change manifests itself in a certain social recklessness.

Now, Mr. President, many people can drink alcohol, and we have heard many descriptions of Churchill. I just finished reading three books on Winston Churchill. I know that he would get up in the morning and start with Johnny Walker Red and he would have wine and sometimes champagne with lunch and maybe a brandy after lunch and maybe another after his nap. He would have a great dinner party and would finish off the evening with brandy. About 11 o'clock he would begin dictating until 3 o'clock in the morning and do so with great clarity of mind. I must say I admire many qualities of Churchill, that included.

Nevertheless, some who use alcohol do suffer from a change in conduct, a loss of judgment, a recklessness, and such behavior is unmistakably present in this evidence. It is clearly there, Mr. President. I would like to say it is not, but it is there. I will not quote from the evidence—I know that all of my colleagues know. One of the incredible aspects of this affair is that Senators have not witnessed that change of behavior. They say that based on the John Tower they know, the John Tower I know, such behavior is inconsistent with his character. The John Tower we know would never do these kinds of reckless things—social abuse of people or abusive language. These actions are not a crime and do not of themselves constitute reason to reject a nomination. But evidence of an alcohol abuse problem which, in his case, alters his judgment, is reason to do so.

Now, there is no doubt that there exists a problem, Mr. President. It has been admitted by Senator Tower himself. He has admitted that, I think, before the committee. He has stated it on public talk shows. There is just no doubt that there is that problem. And in my view there is no doubt that when the problem asserts itself there is this change in judgment.

Nonetheless, this is a very troubling case, Mr. President. Let's address the question of fairness. Is this fair? No, it is not fair. Several things are not fair about it. Senator Tower does not deserve this. After 24 years of public service, he just does not deserve it. The FBI report is not credible evidence in the sense of legal evidence. It is not subject to cross-examination, in some instances it is based upon hearsay, and is based upon unreliable statements in many respects.

My colleague from Maine talked about the need to see a witness and hear him testify. That is important. Every trial lawyer knows that. But one cannot ignore the weight of evidence, the number of instances cited; the amount of evidence here simply cannot be ignored and cannot be denied.

We are told there is a double standard, that we Senators come to the floor with grape and grain on the breath. There is no doubt, Mr. President, that the use of alcohol is not infrequent in this town. Republican administrations, Democratic administrations, and the White House itself use alcohol. I have observed Presidents who drank wine in the White House. That is no revelation to anyone, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The galleries will be in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We have all observed wide ranges of people using alcohol in this town. I will say, Mr. President, that I think Senators are as careful and controlled and responsible in their use of alcohol as any group I have seen. If there is abuse in this body, I do not know about it. But that does not mean it does not exist because, frankly, I did not know about the abuse by Senator Tower.

Nevertheless, there is the question of a double standard. I do not believe there is a double standard involved because it is not a question of a double standard. It is a question of a different standard. We Senators have shared responsibility. The Secretary of Defense has sole responsibility. I heard former Secretary McNamara on television the other night talking about the Cuban missile crisis and he was talking about the troops under "my" command. He was describing the whole Armed Forces of the United States. He then corrected himself and said "under the President's command." But the fact is under the national command authority it goes from the Commander in Chief, the President, to the Secretary of Defense, who is really the operative commander in the field of all the forces. He is the sole commander. We in the Senate share authority.

But the second difference between Senators and the Secretary of Defense is that we are a group who bears responsibility on only a part-time basis and he is always on call. By "sometimes" I mean when the Senate is in session, or when we are in committees, when we are on official duties. At those times our judgment is to be exercised for the United States. But if we are at home with our families, basically our time is our own. No one is going to call us at 3 a.m. and say "come make a decision about whether to respond to the firing of a Libyan rocket." But the Secretary of Defense is subject to that call. It is a different standard. Even if there was clear evidence of abuse of alcohol in this body, which I deny, we could not escape our responsibility for making a judgment about the nominee for Secretary of Defense. We must determine the qualifications of a person who must be consistently and unerringly responsible in his judgment.

Mr. President, finally, there is this question of the no-drink pledge. That, too, is troubling. On a moral level I believe in the right of redemption. I believe Senator Tower is a man of integrity. So when he makes a pledge, it is important evidence. But the fact is he has not yet demonstrated his ability to exercise that unerring judgment; that is to say, he has not demonstrated that he can be alcohol free.

We know enough about the abuse of alcohol that if abusers have one drink they frequently cannot control their appetite for others. Does that mean I think Senator Tower is an alcoholic? I do not mean to use that word because I do not know. I know he is an abuser. I think he speaks of it in terms of being an excessive user at one time.

But, Mr. President, they tell me it is characteristic of the problem that you do not solve an alcohol problem until you admit that you have an alcohol problem—facing up squarely to that problem, not by deflecting it, not by saying I am a disciplined man, I can use it or take it or leave it, but by saying I have a problem. Senator Tower has not done that. Am I certain that he has to do that? Nothing is certain in this record. As I say, there are dull hues of gray all over this record. But I come finally to the conclusion that we have a burden of proof problem here. If this were a criminal trial, I would be the first to say not guilty. If this were a civil trial, I would be the first to say judgment for Senator Tower because the plaintiff has not proven his case by a preponderance of the evidence. But this is neither of those, neither a criminal nor a civil trial, Mr. President.

It is a judgment of the most serious position or one of the most serious positions in this whole land; the person who can determine the very future of the world, whose unerringly consistent judgment is of more vital concern than that of the pilot of the airplane we will next catch. It is not only our future, but the future of the whole world which is at stake. And the burden of proof, when there is a problem unquestionably presented, ought to be on the nominee or on the administration. They must prove that the man is able, without question and at all times, to adequately discharge the duties of his office.

Does this mean that John Tower is not a good man? Not at all; that he is not a loyal American? Not at all; that his service for 24 years in this body was not of a very high standard? Not at all. Does it mean that he is not a very able man on defense, able to give great advice, great judgments, be a great administrator? It does not even mean that. It does not even mean that his character is not of the highest level. All it means, and this is the vital, important and crucial test to me, is that in the nuclear age we cannot afford to take a chance on the man who holds in his hand the future of the world.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, we go through phases in our national politics. I can remember when it was usual to ask, How will it play in Peoria? I suppose if you are the President now, it is nice to know, Will they like it in Lubbock? In my personal case, I like to test it in Tupelo, and all across the State of Mississippi, to see what the reaction of the people is to a particular problem or issue.

In that connection, I had a call from someone in Mississipppi who asked me, "Thad, what in the world is going on up there?" And I said, "Well, I think it is a lot like mud wrestling." I have never seen mud wrestling but I have heard about it. Inevitably, the people involved on both sides end up getting dirtied up or muddy. When it is over, it is hard to tell who has won and who has lost.

As a matter of fact, sometimes it is hard to find a place to stop. It just keeps going until the participants are worn out. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this situation does resemble mud wrestling in some ways. It is a time in the life of the Senate when we have abandoned our rules of fair play with a President, and our credibility is being eroded by the way in which this nomination is being handled by the Senate.

I have not been privy to all the conversations between the White House and the Armed Services Committee concerning this nomination. I have been in the Senate long enough, however, to understand the confirmation process well enough to know the ingredients in a President's decision to nominate a person for a very important position in the judiciary or in the executive branch. The Senate is consulted. That is what the Constitution requires the President to do. The advise and consent power of the Senate has the word advise preceding consent. The Senate shall advise and consent. Well, in the exercise of that power in this instance, Mr. President, I submit that the Senate did not play fairly with the advice that it gave the President when he was considering this nomination.

While I was not privy to the conversations between the President and Members of the Senate in advance of the decision to nominate John Tower for Secretary of Defense, I know from my own personal experience that the President consults. He seeks the advice of those in key positions in the Senate to determine whether or not the President's potential nominee is likely to be confirmed.

The initial manifestation of that advice was the testimony at the hearings of the distinguished senior Senator from Texas, Mr. Bentsen, along with the presentation that was made by the other distinguished Senator from Texas, Mr. GRAMM, both of whom, without any reservation, gave a clear and convincing endorsement of the President's nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

At that time I assumed—if I am incorrect in this assumption, I am sure Senators will point out that I am incorrect—that Senators on the Armed Services Committee, including the chairman of the committee and the ranking Republican Senator, the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Mr. WARNER, had been consulted concerning their reaction to the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I am assuming that the President, as he is bound to do under the Constitution, solicited the advice of these key Senators to see what their reaction would be to his nomination of John Tower.

I do not know what those Senators told the President. I have not asked the President if he has had those conversations.

I have not asked Senators if they have spoken with the President. Those conversations, I am sure, are best left to the knowledge and control of the Senators who were party to those conversations. I assume, however, knowing the procedure that is followed and knowing the constitutional requirements that are imposed upon a President in this instance, that the President was convinced by the reactions he received from these distinguished Senators, who had worked with Senator Tower for years, who had observed him in many situations, both in the Senate and outside the Senate, who knew his record as a negotiator on behalf of our country in Geneva, in the arms talks with the Soviet Union, and as chairman of the Tower Commission that John Tower would be approved by the Armed Services Committee.

The Senate had confirmed Senator Tower before, as a matter of fact, and had approved him as a person well qualified to represent our country in these sensitive negotiations with the greatest military power in the world other than the United States.

It is not as if the Senators were engaging in some sort of guessing game when they gave their reaction to the President of the United States with respect to this nomination. If the Senate is to have credibility as an institution or if individual Senators are to have credibility in this process of advise and consent, it is important for us to be reliable. It is important for the President to be able to rely upon the statements made by Senators in reaction to an intended nomination of a person to a position of this importance.

I am assuming that the President was convinced, because of things that he heard from Senators, that his nomination of John Tower would be acceptable to the Senate and that he would be confirmed. While I do not know that of my personal knowledge, knowing the process as I do, and as any Senator who has served here for any length of time must know it, I believe the President was convinced by statements made to him by customarily reliable Senators that this nomination would be well received by the Senate and that John Tower would be confirmed.

It was mystifying to observe that after the development of the hearing record, the vote on the resolution to recommend on this confirmation was 11 to 9. All 11 who voted against John Tower were on the majority side of that committee, and all 9 who voted for him were on the Republican side of the committee. The vote was interesting to me because we all know these Senators to be very intelligent. It was puzzling to see them all view the same evidence, hear the same witnesses, read the same reports, know the same individual nominee, and still disagree so sharply along party lines.

We have heard Senators explain the reasons for their decisions and how they came to reach their conclusions. It is mystifying that educated and well-intentioned Senators could follow the same process and come to different conclusions, as they did, along strict party lines, and then say that these decisions were based on considerations other than party affiliation. It is mystifying.

Now we are at the point where we have to answer whether the Senate is going to continue to be a credible partner with the executive in the process of filling important executive and judicial positions in the future. I hope this is an aberration in the Senate's exercise of responsibility under the advise and consent power of the Constitution.

I could understand it better and would be less aggravated by the way the process has developed if the nominee had been someone unknown to the Senate. If this nominee were someone who had occupied some lesser position in the Government, and the committee staff had perfunctorily checked out the prospective nominee and advised Senators about his background, his competence, his habits, his public and private conduct, and the Senators had misunderstood or not delved deeply enough and said, "Mr. President, that nominee sounds fine to me, we recommend you submit his name to the Senate," I could understand the way this process has developed. But that is not the way it happened.

I am assuming that the President was led to believe this nominee would be acceptable to the Senate. I am just as confident as I can be that is the fact. To see the Senate now throw up its hands collectively in holy horror and say, "Oh, no, you cannot have this nominee confirmed, look what we have found out about him," is incredible. It is truly incredible.

It think the rules of fairness have been set aside, Mr. President, not just in the treatment of the nominee. Others have talked about that. I was not a party to that process in the committee. I did not observe it from close enough range to draw conclusions about the choice of witnesses and the procedures followed.

I do know, however, that there is no question whatsoever about the competence of this nominee, about his knowledge, his expertise, his tenacity, his ability to be a very formidable adversary, to be combative in behalf of the principles and convictions that he holds. He is a man of conviction. He feels very strongly that the United States should be a very capable military power. He feels that very strongly, and some do not like that.

As Secretary of Defense there is no question that he would be in charge of the management of the Department of Defense and would yield to no one in the prerogatives of leadership in the defense of our country, and some do not like that.

There is no question that he would be a combative adversary in the Halls of Congress when dealing with matters relating to the defense budget, and he would know a great deal more than almost everyone in Congress about the budget, the weapon systems, the details of our defense establishment, and some do not like that.

I know there are other things that some do not like about the qualities of this nominee for Secretary of Defense. But, Mr. President, I am convinced from my personal observation of him over the period I have served in the Senate and in the other body, and in following his work as chairman of the Tower Commission and as a negotiator in Geneva, that the nominee is unequaled in his ability to deal with these complicated subjects and to deal with them in an effective way.

I am hoping, that before the Senate completes its consideration of this nomination it will carefully consider the implications of the actions that may be taken here, of the way this nomination process has developed. Mr. President, the rules of fairness ought to be reinstituted—it is not late—to ensure the fairness this institution owes to this President on this nomination and the fairness it owes to the nominee.

When I came to the Senate this afternoon to make these remarks, I saw on my desk a letter written by a number of John Tower's former staff members concerning his qualifications and their opinions of him as a person. I am told that it has been put in the RECORD.

I urge those who have not made a decision on this nomination to take a look at this letter.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the floor at this time and simply request the Senate to reinstitute our rules of fairness to this President and to this nominee and to vote for the confirmation of John Tower.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have mentioned a time or two the right of due process as embodied in the fifth amendment to the Constitution which tells us that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and since John Tower will not be deprived of life, liberty, or property if the Senate does reject his nomination, he is not as a technical matter probably entitled to the due process protections in any event.

Nonetheless, the spirit of procedural due process, a principle that lies at the heart of this Nation's concept of fairness, has certainly been violated by the Senate and the Armed Services Committee treatment of John Tower.

The accepted requirements of procedural due process are as follows: notice, No. 1; an opportunity for hearing, No. 2; impartial tribunal, No. 3; the opportunity for confrontation and cross-examination of witnesses, No. 4; the discovery of evidence, No. 5; and the decision on the record, No. 6.

It seems to me that notwithstanding the best efforts of the committee, John Tower has been denied due process.

I just heard a Senator on the floor, the Senator from Louisiana said he has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. I did not know we had a criminal trial going here, beyond a reasonable doubt, and I have heard other Senators say beyond a reasonable doubt.

But to satisfy procedural due process, a person must normally receive advanced notice of a charge against him. If we are talking about beyond a resonable doubt, we get into the area where I think we ought to take a look.

There must be notice to enable the person to determine what is being proposed and what he must do to prevent the deprivation of his interest.

Of course, John Tower had not received any advanced notice, has not had access to the FBI file, does not know the nature of the allegations that were gathered over the weekend. He has learned a lot of the charges through television, newspapers, radio. So I think it is fair to say he has not had notice.

And, of course, someone said this is not a trial, but then we hear the words, well, beyond a reasonable doubt, the weight of the evidence. I never was a very good lawyer, but those words used to be used by lawyers that I knew.

And notwithstanding again the best efforts of the Armed Services Committee, there were four witnesses called. None were sworn. As I understand, two more or less repudiated what they said in open session once they were in closed session.

One witness was Paul Weyrich, who sent me a handwritten note last Saturday saying he is still opposed to the Tower nomination but when he was in closed session he asked that John Tower be brought into that room so he could face his accuser, and that right was denied and he does not think that is very fair.

So John Tower does not know today the extent of the charges, and even a common criminal is entitled to know the precise nature of the charges made against him and to respond to these charges in a proper forum.

It has just been suggested by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi maybe the Armed Services Committee vote did not represent an impartial tribunal and again as many in this body know better than I, many are former judges, attorneys general, learned in the practice of law, but one of the most prominent Supreme Court decisions, Goldberg versus Kelley touches on procedural due process and describes the cross-examination requirement as follows:

> In almost every setting where important decisions turn on questions of fact, due process requires an opportunity to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses.

Did John Tower have the right to do that? No, we have an FBI file. In fact, we have several files—the majority file, which contains a Jackson story, which was later blown out of the water, in it, among other things. Allegations, innuendo, with John Tower given no right, or anybody else for that matter given any right, to cross-examine the witnesses to see what their motives might be. Maybe their memory was faulty. Maybe they perjured themselves. Maybe they were motivated by malice or vindictiveness or prejudice or jealously or politics.

And the accused—and he is the accused—at least ought to have the right of confrontation and cross-examination.

It has already been demonstrated that many of the allegations were based on faulty memories. The allegations of drunkenness by an Arizona businessman, an Arizona pollster, I believe, are prime examples.

And some of the statements may be fact. No one is certain of that. But, notwithstanding that, John Tower has not had one single opportunity, not one, to confront and cross-examaine persons who have challenged his integrity. The Supreme Court has suggested that an individual must be given the opportunity to engage in discovery of the evidence that is used against him. Since he does not have access to the contents of the FBI file, he obviously cannot engage in discovery of the evidence that has been used so brutally to defame his character.

So it seems to me that, though the chairman has said, and I do not quarrel with him, this is not a trial nor can the Senate conduct its review as if it were, I think many Senators who have spoken on this floor have used standards that are normally used in a trial, a criminal trial, beyond any reasonable doubt, as though he were standing charged with some criminal activity, a felony. So somebody who goes up in S-407 and they leaf through all this file, not a report, a file, nobody made a judgment; they put everything in there but the kitchen sink. As the FBI agent told me yesterday, "We don't report, we file, and you get the file."

Now I still believe in fairness, and I think most Senators do, and I am not questioning anyone's motives. But I do not believe any objective observer, any objective observer who may have watched, say, C-SPAN for the last 5 days will tell you that John Tower has received a fair shake.

I saw a letter today from a former outstanding reporter now retired, who had been watching C-SPAN. I never talked to him much when he was here. He was pretty liberal. He reported for the New York Times. But in that letter, he made some observations. He said he had been watching the debate and he believed that, among the people who were looking at this objectively, not as some partisan on one side or the other, John Tower was a clear winner.

I know the numbers in this body. It is 55 to 45. It takes a miracle at this point for John Tower to be confirmed. Frankly, my responsibility to my President and to my party is to do the best I can to see that he is confirmed. I have tried to use my persuasive powers with my own colleagues and with anybody else who would listen.

I will admit my bias, because I am a friend of John Tower, and because I have worked together with John Tower. I was never close to John Tower; not many people were. That may be one of the problems. But I knew him to be a man of his word, a man of integrity, honesty, diligence, and a good Senator.

I suggested last week the one way to resolve this—you know there are Members of this body who have never seen John Tower except on televison. They never met him, never shaken his hand, never looked him in the eyes, never asked him a question, never heard him speak, never saw him in person. So I have suggested maybe one way to remedy that is to bring him to the Senate; let him stand here in the well; let him make a statement on why he thinks he should be confirmed by some of his former colleagues and some new faces in the Senate; let him make a statement about how he sees the defense picture and what his role would be as Secretary of Defense; let him respond to questions, even though he has not seen the FBI file, in public session.

It has been done before in the U.S. Senate. As I recited last week, it was done by motion, but it can also be done by unanimous consent.

I do not treat that lightly. I think it has been done maybe 6 times, maybe more—the Presiding Officer would know precisely, and probably the dates.

But it has been done. There is precedent for it. It should be done in this case before some make final judgment.

Keep in mind only 20 are on the Armed Services Committee. Eighty Senators are not. Keep in mind 71 Senators served with John Tower; 29 have not. We are talking about 50 votes, 51 votes, hopefully more than that 55, 60.

I have discussed this with John Tower before I suggested it. I would not try to embarrass John Tower or my colleagues or myself. He said he was willing, not only willing to come here, but willing to come to your office, willing to talk to you on the telephone. I think some have been kind enough to talk to him on both sides.

Mr. President, I notified the majority leader on Friday and gave copies to the majority leader on Monday. I learned from the distinguished Presiding Officer—and we worked together—two leaders have to get along, notwithstanding what happens in this Chamber.

But, you do not surprise each other if you are going to be around here a long time. One surprise party could end the relationship.

So I gave copies of the unanimous-consent request to the distinguished majority leader and I would like to propound that unanimous-consent request now.

I have only made one change in the copy I gave the majority leader and he will see what that is. It is just the time agreed upon by the two leaders.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the former Senator from Texas, Mr. Tower, be brought before the Senate at a time agreed upon by the majority and minority leaders for the purpose of answering such questions that may be asked him or to make any explanation he may have in mind on the merits of the proposition before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader reserves the right to object?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, last Friday the distinguished Republican leader said that he was considering asking unanimous consent that Senator Tower be allowed to personally appear in the Senate to state his case. On Monday, he provided me with a copy of the request that he was considering.

I told Senator DOLE on Friday and on Monday that I would consider the matter and would respond to the request when made. I have considered it. He has now made the request.

For the reasons I will now set forth, I intend to object to the request.

The deliberations over the nomination of John Tower as Secretary of Defense have been going on for a long time. The subject has been discussed at length at the White House and here in the Senate. We are now in the fifth full day of debate on the Senate floor. There has been more than ample opportunity for Senators to consider the nomination, to examine the information available to them, to talk with Senator Tower, and to determine how they will vote. In fact, almost every Senator has already decided and announced how they will vote.

Speculation on Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense began in 1980, in connection with the first Reagan cabinet. It resumed the day he announced his retirement from the Senate in August 1983. It continued throughout President Reagan's second term. It rose sharply after the election last November.

That lengthy speculation was confirmed on December 16, when President Bush announced his intention to nominate Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense. The Senate formally received the nomination on January 20, 1989.

The Armed Services Committee held both public hearings and closed meetings with Senator Tower on January 25, 26, 31, and on February 1, and with outside witnesses on January 31. At those meetings, Senator Tower was afforded the opportunity to make statements and to answer any questions put to him by members of the committee.

In addition, Senator Tower has had personal meetings with each of the Senators on the Armed Services Committee as well as with a number of other Senators, including the leadership, and numerous meetings with the chairman and ranking member of the committee. He has talked by telephone with many other Senators. At each of these meetings, and in each of these conversations, the Senators were free to ask any questions of the nominee and he was free to answer them.

Senator Tower has also conducted a vigorous public campaign for his nomination with interviews in national newspapers and on network television shows and public appearances.

The material compiled by the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been available to all Senators on the Armed Services Committee beginning February 14 and to all Members of the Senate since February 27. Copies of the committee's majority report have been available for review by all Senators since February 27, the minority report since March 1.

The FBI afforded Senator Tower the opportunity to respond to each of the allegations made against him and Senators have been able to read those responses, along with other materials contained in the FBI files.

Senator Tower was also given the opportunity to personally rebut the testimony of the outside witnesses who testified before the committee and to call outside rebuttal witnesses in his defense. He turned down both offers.

Furthermore, copies of the transcripts of the Armed Services Committee's closed sessions, in which Senator Tower was questioned about the allegations made against him, have been available for review by Senators since early last week.

I know of no Member of the Senate who has been handicapped by a lack of information in forming a judgment on the suitability of Senator Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

I know of no Senator who has not been available to Senator Tower. Recently, up to and including late yesterday, several Senators told me they had received telephone calls from and had talked with Senator Tower.

In summary, there is no indication whatever of an absence of opportunity for Senator Tower to make his case or for Senators to consider his case.

What, then, is the purpose of the request?

In his remarks on Friday Senator DOLE said it would be made so Senator Tower could, in Senator DOLE's, "stand in this well and * * * answer his critics." But of course his critics are those who presented evidence to the Armed Services Committee. Should those persons also be invited to come to the Senate floor to answer questions?

We should also ask ourselves: What kind of precedent would we be setting for consideration of future Cabinet nominees?

Where would we stop?

Would only nominees who had previously served in the Senate be asked to appear?

If a nominee who had not previously served in the Senate received an unfavorable committee recommendation and then asked to appear before the Senate and we say no, could he fairly claim that we gave Senator Tower preferential treatment just because he had been a Senator?

We only ask controversial nominees to appear?

What would constitute controversy?

Would we put the nominee under oath?

If persons other than the nominee were asked to appear, would they be put under oath?

Could a nominee ask to appear?

Could persons other than a nominee ask to appear?

On what grounds would we refuse such requests?

There is also the question of whether such a session would be open or closed. Because it almost certainly will deal with matters in the FBI files that the President refuses to make public, and that in response to the Republican leader's request, cannot be discussed in open session, how could the inquiry be conducted in open session? Or, would the session have to be closed?

These are some of the questions which come immediately to mind. There are, I am sure, many others which could be posed by other Senators. But these few are enough to demonstrate just how unnecessary and unworkable such a process would be.

There is another consideration which the Republican leader and the nominee ought to take into account.

There is no precedent for this request on behalf of a Cabinet nominee, or indeed any nominee. In fact, there have been according to the research of my staff, only five instances in which individuals have been brought before the Senate for questioning, including the two referred to by the Republican leader on Friday. Four of them involved allegations of contempt of the Senate and one involved the disciplining of a Senate employee.

No one has made contempt or disciplinary charges against Senator Tower. Therefore, I believe that it would be inappropriate, and unfair to the nominee, to have Senator Tower come before the Senate based upon these historical precedents.

Our responsibity is to vote on his nomination to be Secretary of Defense. I very much hope that we can do that soon.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have stated, I object to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I listened carefully to the distinguished majority leader as he reserves the right to object, and he did object. He expresses concern over precedent, but I would assume the Senate sets precedents from time to time. In fact, we might set one here if Senator Tower is defeated.

As far as I can determine, there has never been a nominee rejected at this point in a new President's term. That is without precedent. That is why it seems to me that the procedure I outlined is relevant in this instance. The fact of the matter is, outsiders have been brought before this Senate to answer questions, or explain what they may have on their mind. I have not gone back to read the questions asked of those five individuals. And there would be some details we must work out—a person brought before the Senate should be sworn, or how he is going to be interrogated, those are all details we can discuss.

It is all right with me if he is sworn. I assume the two leaders or their designees would do the interrogation or perhaps if there is someone who has been wanting to ask a question and never had the opportunity to ask Senator Tower directly—that Senator could pose the questions directly.

No, I did not make the request because John Tower was a former colleague. It seems he has demonstrated if you are a former colleague around here, you are going to get kicked all over the place. I made the request because this nominee has been hurt. There have been phone calls. There are pages and pages and pages of FBI files, some favorable, some unfavorable. I want one more chance to set the record straight.

But I made the request because the basic issue in this instance is fairness. Somebody said today, "Well, this was troubling nomination for President Bush." It was troubling only in the sense that a lot of questions had been raised, and the President wanted to check them out very carefully before he made a nomination. A lot of rumors and a lot of stories motivated by nobody knows what were all over the country, and the President succeeded in trying to check them out, as he should. That takes time. But he was satisfied when he sent the nomination to us, and he is still satisfied as recently as an hour or two ago that John Tower is the best qualified man in America for the job.

It was President Bush in his inaugural speech who extended his hand of friendship and bipartisanship to all of us. But through a systematic, or at least a series of leaks to the press, and wild unsubstantiated stories, John Tower lost a lot of ground—a lot of ground. The polls showed he was down 2 or 3 to 1, that nobody wanted him to be Secretary of Defense. Why would they? If they believe half the stuff that was in print, they would not want him around anywhere.

Whether we debate 5 days or 50 days, this is important. It is not how many days we debate, but how and why we debate.

We are here to debate the merits of this nomination. The Secretary of Defense has a budget of $300 billion. But we have not spent much time on the Pentagon or Packard Commission reforms. The Secretary of Defense oversees America's defense. But we have not spent much time on our men and women in uniform or on force structure. We spent more time on whether John Tower drank excessively which he said he did do at times in the seventies.

There is no doubt in my mind, when it is all said and done, the one issue that bothers Senators is that John may have a drinking problem. He does not have a drinking problem.

I have heard Senator after Senator stand up and say, "I am concerned about allegations and innuendos about drinking." That is what bothers the chairman. It is a matter of concern to others, and I do not dismiss that it is a matter of concern to others.

Those who have known John Tower, and traveled with John Tower, and worked with John Tower in this Chamber for 20 some years, with one exception, have never seen John Tower under the influence of alcohol or inebriated.

So in addition to the unanimous-consent request, I have another option. That would be to move that the former Senator from Texas, Mr. Tower, be brought before the Senate at a time agreed upon by the majority and minority leaders for the purpose of answering such questions that may be asked him or to make any explanation he may have in mind on the merits of the proposition before the Senate. I have indicated to the majority leader I will not make that motion this evening.

Another option would be to move to recommit the nomination to the Senate Armed Services Committee, following up on a suggestion made by the chairman a couple of weeks ago. The committee could then call more witnesses. This time it could call in some witnesses favorable to Tower.

But I am going to suggest something now that I think will be a challenge to all of us. I have listened to a lot of the debate, and I know some of it has been based on serious concerns, and I do not dismiss anything that anyone says lightly. I have listened to, I think, almost every minute, either I do it on the floor or I catch it in my office, or watch it on C-SPAN later in the evening. I refuse to believe that there is hostility toward John Tower in this Chamber. I refuse to believe that there are some in this Chamber who think he is not qualified.

I refuse to believe that the President of the United States should not have his nominee confirmed. He did win the election last November. He did promise us he would send us top-flight nominees, and he has. The majority leader, I might add, has been most cooperative in making certain they were brought to the floor as soon as they were reported by the committee.

(Mr. CONRAD assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Some have said, "Oh, well, every nominee has been adopted with the exception of one." I am not certain that is relevant. The nomination in front of us now is the nomination of John G. Tower, and it is John Tower who has been treated so unfairly.

I talked with John Tower this afternoon. I told Senator Tower that it does not look good. I told him, as I viewed it, we did not have the votes. I told him, as I viewed it, that the one basic concern expressed by Members whom I respect was drinking, and if that were gone he would be confirmed, not unanimously but with a heavy vote. And I said to Senator Tower, I am going to the floor and make one last suggestion because I believe in you and I believe in the President. And I am going to need your cooperation when I do it. And he said go ahead.

I am going to accept the concerns which people have about drinking. I am going to rely on the good faith of those who have stated that because I have respect for my colleagues. We get carried away sometimes, but we generally get back to Earth in 24 hours.

I told Senator Tower I would go to the Senate floor, and I would tell my colleagues OK, this drinking concern has caused a problem for Senator Tower and for some Senators who would like to vote for him, and for others, who have not made up their mind. I suggest that Senator Tower give President Bush a letter of resignation dated October 1, 1989—in 6 months—and that for 6 months he has a trial period as Secretary of Defense. Then he would come back for reconfirmation.

I understand that Members I respect—and I have had private meetings with some who have raised this issue, and I will not name their names. They are Members on the other side of the aisle in whom I have confidence. We would confirm John Tower. I would hold up a letter of resignation addressed to the President effective October 1. That is 6 months and 2 weeks from now. The President said the Pentagon is going to enforce the sobriety test. Most of us do not believe there is going to be any problem. But it gives this Senate, that I am very proud of, a second opportunity. It addresses the concerns raised by the chairman and by the majority leader and by others. At the same time it gives President Bush under this restraint his choice for Secretary of Defense.

Now, obviously, to make this work some Members have to agree that this man, this nominee, this former colleague, this former arms negotiator, this chairman of the Tower Commission, this chief petty officer, this father—two of his daughters were in the gallery today—deserves that chance.

I have been around for awhile, and I have seen people fail. I have seen people make mistakes, and I have seen people drink excessively. I have found most people, men or women, Republicans, Democrats or independents, were willing to give anyone that second chance.

I have heard speaker after speaker come to this floor and say this is a close call. I heard the eloquent statement of Senator BENSTEN today. I have heard others who came down the other way. But to everyone it is a close call. To some who have not yet spoken I know it is a close call.

If we are concerned about that problem and the chain of command and all the other arguments that have been made, OK let us address it. Let us put the burden on the nominee. I hope that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle would accept what I have said in the spirit it was offered.

I know where the votes are. I know this should not be partisan. We have probably been a bit partisan; the other side has been a bit partisan too. But the bottom line is that John Tower should be confirmed. Someone told me, "He might be there 4 or 8 years." Under my plan he will be there only 6 months, and then he will come back to this body, and the chairman and the ranking Republican and others on the Armed Services Committee, and everyone else who works with the Pentagon, will have ample opportunity to determine his fitness, his competence and anything else about John Tower.

I can also state that I have mentioned this to the President of the United States. I have discussed it with the Chief of Staff of the White House. I have not discussed it with a single colleague on this side. Some may not agree with what I have said, but it seems to me that before a vote is taken we at least ought to give it serious consideration.

If we say under no conditions will John Tower ever be Secretary of Defense, not 1 day, not 1 month, not 1 week, not 6 months, well, we can say that. The majority has the votes. But it would seen to me that this addresses the concerns expressed by many Members of this body, as I said permits the President to have someone in whom he has total faith.

What could be fairer?

Do you all know somebody to whom you have given a second chance in your office or in your home or in your family? Maybe they had a problem. Maybe they were broke. But did you just kick them out and say, "Well, no way"? No, you did not. A lot of us have had second chances because of somebody else, somebody's generosity. And that is what makes America different. If somebody asked me, "Is there any decency left in the Senate?" I would say yes.

After our battles and after all the discussion—and sometimes tempers flare and sometimes people overstate their cases—there is a lot of decency in the Senate.

So I make that suggestion in a spirit of decency and fairness, not because John Tower used to work here, but because John Tower deserves that kind of treatment, so I just leave it to my colleagues. I hope that we might consider it overnight, think about it. I can have the letter here by sometime tomorrow. I encourage my colleagues in every way that I can to give this most serious consideration.

That addresses the primary concern. For those concerned about defense contractors, I think the record is fairly clear that John Tower received about $764,000 gross receipts from defense-related contracts. Tower and Associates received that much, not John Tower. About 60 cents of every dollar went for overhead, rent, and salaries. In 1987, he made about $100,000 from defense-related contracts, less than most Senators who take honoraria. In 1988 he made $160,000. In 2 years he made $260,000, about the same that he would have made in the Senate with his salary plus honoraria. He is not a wealthy man. He also lectured at Southern Methodist University, had a retirement program, and he had some other income from contracts unrelated to defense. I do not believe that anyone else believes anybody bought John Tower.

One thing that has not been stressed is he did not ask to go to Geneva as an arms negotiator. When he left the Senate, he was prepared to go out in the private sector. But he went at the request of the Secretary of State, George Shultz. He volunteered for 14 more months of public service. Now he is criticized for having done that and then returning to the business he had planned to pursue, working for certain defense contractors.

It has even been hinted by some that he might have divulged secret information. The State Department regulation covers that. It says you do not have to purge your mind of your experience, but you do have to use your good judgment. You do not give away any confidential information. I do not think any record has been made that he did.

I think those are the two key areas, but primarily it gets back to drinking. I have heard colleague after colleague, story after story, leak after leak. It all gets back to drinking. I have listened to statements on the floor all day today.

So for those of us who know John Tower, and know his capabilities, his diligence, his intelligence, and his patriotism, I think we owe it to him to give him that second chance that many of us have had; I have had. I bet others have had second chances too.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, our respect for the distinguished Republican leader is such that we should and will give this request, as we should and will give all of his requests, serious consideration. I had not, prior to his speaking the words here, been aware that he was to make this proposal. I will immediately consult with as many of my colleagues as I can to determine what the reaction of other Senators is.

I must say that, as the distinguished Republican leader was speaking, my reaction immediately is to say that the national interest requires that we move promptly with the business of naming a permanent Secretary of Defense. The arguments made in behalf of this nominee have focused to a significant degree upon that need. There is to my knowledge no precedent for a 6-month—what appears to be—probationary period for a Cabinet official. I know the distinguished Republican leader thought about the effect this would have on the Department of Defense and the President, and the Secretary and the manner in which he would or would not be able to conduct the business of that important Department.

But as I have indicated, I do have great personal respect and affection for the distinguished Republican leader, and therefore take seriously whatever proposal he will make now or in the future, and—nothwithstanding my immediate serious concerns about the proposal, and I state that merely because I want to candidly indicate what my immediate reaction is—that I will contact as many of my colleagues as I can, and as the Republican leader suggested, overnight.

But I must say that this has been a very long, contentious process. I believe all but two or three Senators have already publicly announced how they will vote. Those, I believe, will do so very shortly. And my strong reaction prior to the moment when the distinguished Republican leader spoke was that we ought to complete action on this matter, that we ought to vote, that we ought to end it one way or the other, that the deliberation has been very long, very difficult for all concerned, and that at some point a decision must be made.

I will, however, in good faith and good spirit, notwithstanding what my strong feelings were immediately prior to his remarks, consult with some of my colleagues—some are here; they may wish to express their immediate reactions; that is entirely up to them—and discuss it further with the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Could I say one more word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. I apologize to the majority leader and my colleagues for not addressing the very question he raised. I failed to do that. Six months and 2 weeks would be the end of the fiscal year. That would permit the Secretary of Defense to continue the work that he has been doing at the Pentagon, the Department of Defense, to get to work on the budget, to get to work on other issues that are pending in the Pentagon and demonstrate that for those, whether they made up their mind or not—a lot of times we make up our minds, but then there is a changed circumstance. And this would be a changed circumstance. This would not be a 6-month confirmation. He would be confirmed, the President would have a letter, and he would have to send him back up here again in October.

So before anybody said well, this thing about stability, think about it. If we do not have this nominee confirmed, who has been on the job, who understands it, it is going to be in a couple more months probably before we have a Secretary of Defense. But even more importantly, I am appealing to the institution, the U.S. Senate not to destroy someone, because of the concerns that have been expressed. If they are real, this is an opportunity to underscore our concerns, the Senate's concerns. It is a higher standard, and we mean business to the extent that it is going to be a short leash. It is going to indicate to the President that notwithstanding his right to nominate, we are going to have a right to review.

So I would hope that it would be seriously considered. I offered it in that spirit, and I had a very frank discussion with Senator Tower. I did not have good news for him. He was disappointed, but he is an adult, and he understands that we do make decisions sometimes people disagree with. I thank the majority leader for that indication.

Mr. MITCHELL. I just make one additional comment, which I neglected to make, that I do not want anyone to—and I know that the distinguished Republican leader does not—underestimate the other factors involved in this process. It is true that many of the statements have discussed the issue of excessive drinking, and if you read the newspaper reports, it is largely focused on that. But if you read the statements made by Senators, there is a great deal of concern on the conflict of interest.

I went back and read the statements of all of the Armed Services Committee members, when they voted, and have read almost every statement made on the floor which I have not heard, and I have watched the coverage of those statements. Almost invariably, a Senator who expressed concern on both of those issues was reported, either exclusively or principally, as being concerned with the issue of excessive drinking.

What I am saying is that the focus of attention and the fulcrum of decision for many Senators was largely the conflict issue, which, of course, this would not resolve. Of course, the other aspect of it is that the very feature which makes it attractive from the standpoint of the distinguished Republican leader would make it unattractive for most Members of the Senate, and the only thing worse than having to go through this once would be to have to go through it twice. I think that is something we have to bear in mind, but I want very much to approach this earnestly and in good faith, and I commit myself to do that to the Republican leader.

As I said, I will instantly, upon leaving the floor, begin to contact as many of my colleagues as I can to discuss it, to consider it, to get reaction, and will then get back to him as soon as I can.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield for one comment, I do not think it will be a matter of going over it again. Either during that 6-month period Senator Tower would have persuaded his colleagues—demonstrated, not just persuaded—that he was the right person to be in that office, or he probably would not have a nomination to come up here. If he demonstrated during that period that he had all the talent that the President has suggested, as have many of us, there would not be any problem in the nomination. If he failed, he probably would not be the nominee. But it seems to me that—and we have been at this nomination now for a couple of months—it is not a perfect solution. To some, it may not be a solution at all. I did note in my comment that some did have questions about conflict of interest—the Senator from Michigan, for example.

As I listened to the speeches and listened to the comments, the primary concern was the drinking. The former majority leader, the Senator from West Viriginia, had a problem with conflict of interest, he told me.

He did not get into other things, but he would still have a problem. He probably would not vote for that proposal. But as to those whose primary concern was drinking, if that were addressed in that fashion, there would be a clear majority for John Tower, and that was the thrust of my suggestion.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am the junior member of the Armed Services Committee. I have not had very much to say about the nomination. I have listened carefully, however, to what others have said, and I have read the committee reports of the majority and the minority, and the independent and separate views.

My concerns are not just with one area. My concerns include the conflict of interest question. I think this is an effort on the part of the Republican leader, as a valued leader and supporter of his President, and I cannot fault Senator DOLE for that. He has done everything that he could do in support of the nominee, and he is still doing so. I cannot agree with everything that he has said, but he is certainly to be given high marks for following his President, upholding his President, and defending the nominee.

I have had a long friendship with BOB DOLE, and I have a good working relationship with him. That friendship still exists. So what I have to say is difficult, but this has not been easy for any of us. It has not been easy for me to listen to those who speak of the nominee's family. I feel for that family. I feel for Senator Tower's daughters. I feel for the nominee.

Yet, Mr. President, there have been other nominees who have had families. Roger Taney was rejected for Secretary of Treasury in 1843, having been nominated by Jackson. I am not sure that he had a family, but I am sure that if he did have, they were disappointed.

Caleb Cushing was nominated by John Tyler three times on the same day, and was rejected three times on the same day, the last day of the session on March 3, 1843. If he had a family, I am sure they, too, were hurt. He was rejected three times for Secretary of the Treasury.

Charles Warner was named by Calvin Coolidge to be Attorney General, and he was rejected twice within a 6-day period. I am sure that it was painful for him, his family, his relatives.

So we all have to understand that people who are rejected are going to be hurt. All of us have been through campaigns, election campaigns, in which we have been vilified and excoriated. I went through the same thing in 1982 and in 1988.

And there is no balm for the wounds that we carry when the Republican National Committee turns out information that is distorted, misleading, and wrong, and puts it into the hands of our opponents.

I have children. I have grandchildren likewise. And so I know the pain that they are caused by vilification, abuse, and vindictiveness.

But, Mr. President, we Senators asked for this job. We ran for the Senate and we took an oath standing before our colleagues in this Chamber and before the audience in the gallery and before the television audience all over this country to support and defend the Constitution of the United States to the best of our ability, against all enemies foreign and domestic, "so help me God."

That Constitution places a responsibility on us that someone else wrote into that document in 1787. Our forefathers in this body shouldered that responsibility.

It was difficult for William Maclay, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, in the First Congress, to stand before his colleagues when George Washington sent up to the name of William Short to be Minister to France—it was difficult for Maclay to stand and say that the nomination ought to be decided by secret ballot.

Oliver Ellsworth took the opposite position. Maclay said that the decision ought to be by secret ballot because a Senator would fear that he would lose his place in the Presidential sunshine if he openly opposed the nomination, and conversely, he might vote against his own conscience in order to earn the President's warmth. The motion was debated, and Maclay won. They voted by secret ballot and William Short was confirmed.

These matters were conducted in executive session until 1929 when that requirement was stricken from the rules.

Mr. President, what I am saying is this: It is not an easy task to sit in judgment on a nominee, especially a former colleague. This Senate has already approved a former Senator during this session. We have heard it said in this debate that the Senate is kicking John Tower, a former colleague, around. But Nicholas Brady is a former Senator, and he has already been confirmed by this Senate without a dissenting vote for Secretary of the Treasury.

I think it is our duty not to be swayed from what we know our proper course to be. If we go down this road—I have heard a lot of talk about precedents—this will indeed, be a new precedent and a bad one. We are going to give try-out periods to nominees. Which nominee? Those only who are former Senators? Would that be fair to others?

Mr. President, this proposal is pregnant with all kinds of problems for us and for those Senators who will serve after us. There is no guarantee beyond the 6-month period. What then happens? Once Mr. Tower is confirmed, what recourse does the Senate have? None.

What about those of us who have other legitimate concerns as well as the one concern that has been mentioned here most frequently? What assurance do we have? Who is to be the judge?

Mr. President, if we go down this road, we are going to meet this precedent again in our own time, and those who serve after us will rue the day that we chose to follow this course.

The Constitution says that the President shall—it does not say he may—it says he shall—the President "shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint * * *." The President, and only he, has the power to nominate. But there are three phases in the appointment process: the nomination by the President, the assent by the Senate, and the presentation by the President of the commission of appointment.

So the Senate has an equal voice in the appointment. If the Senate does not give its consent, the appointment never goes forward.

Mr. President, there has been much said about fairness. Mr. Tower has had ample opportunities to make his case and we listened. He made his case before the committee in public and in executive session. He has been on the airwaves. He has been on television, and he has commanded the center of attention in the print media.

I am in my office. If he wants to come and see me, he can come. He has access to every Senator here, and there is no Senator who would turn him away from the door.

But this is a desperation move, and as one Senator, I am not going to go along with it. It is our responsibility to make a decision. We have had ample time to do that, and I think we ought to do it and get on with other business.

So, Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, the majority leader will do what he says he will, he will consider it, and he will talk with other Senators.

The Constitution does not say that any nominee is to be given a trial period. That Constitution does not say that we Senators even have to vote on a nomination.

There have been nominations that have never been voted on and, therefore, never confirmed. There have been some that have been withdrawn. There has been at least one, the nomination of James Green, under President Tyler, for Secretary of the Treasury, where the nominee was rejected but the vote was not recorded.

So we are not mandated to vote. But we owe this nominee a vote. We owe this President a vote. We owe the American people a vote. And we owe ourselves a vote.

We ought to cut it clean. We ought not leave some hazy never-never land out there and leave this thing hanging in the balance for 6 months. And who knows what will happen thereafter.

So, Mr. President, I think the time has come to cast our vote and I would urge all Senators who are on this side of the aisle and who will be contacted by the majority leader and other Senators, if there be Senators on the other side of the aisle who have not made up their minds, I would urge them to take a stand now.

Let us vote this nominee up or vote the nominee down. Let us cut it clean and the President can send up another nominee. There are other potential nominees who are just as able and who do not carry the burdens that this nomination has carried. There are individuals who are preeminently able to carry out the functions and responsibilities of the Secretary of Defense, some of them have already been confirmed by the Senate in years past. It is not that this is the one and only nominee sui generis for the Secretary of Defense.

So, Mr. President, I say the time has come to make a decision, and we ought not further to dawdle, hem and haw, and fool away much additional time in bringing this matter to a conclusion.

Now, I close as I began. I have great respect for Senator BOB DOLE as an individual. I am sorry to have to take this position in opposition to his proposal, but we have been over that course before also. I think the Senate will be making a terrible mistake if it goes for this ostensibly attractive suggestion. I hope we do not go for it, and that we vote tomorrow up or down on the nomination.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the benefit of our colleagues, after consultation with the distinguished Republican leader, I can announce that there will be no rollcall votes this evening.

It is my intention that we will continue in session until approximately 8 p.m.; that we will return to session tomorrow morning at 9:30, and following the time for leaders and a period for morning business until 10 p.m., we will then return to debate on the Tower nomination. I will be consulting with the distinguished Republican leader with respect further to tomorrow's schedule this evening and tomorrow morning, and hope to announce further plans with respect to the schedule in the morning.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield very briefly so I might correct the RECORD?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Roger Taney was rejected in 1834, rather than 1843. I got my figures crossed.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am delighted to inform the majority leader and our good friend from West Virginia who made that correction, I was about to correct him on that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield so I may make a correction?

Mr. NUNN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am just advised that I said 10 p.m. tomorrow. Maybe the number of errors is probably a pretty good indication that we ought to end shortly.

I intended, of course, to say 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow morning that we would return to consideration of this matter, half hour for the leaders and morning business, and then at 10 o'clock in the morning, back on this.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I will just take a moment. I know Senator LIEBERMAN has been waiting for a long time.

But, I, too, have great respect for the minority leader. Any proposal he puts forth deserves our serious consideration, so I agree with the majority leader's assessment.

I will sleep on this proposal and come to a conclusion tomorrow about my reaction to it. But I do think that there are serious questions that I will be asking and I think others should also ask, and that is that we are, in effect, being asked to put the Secretary of Defense on a 6-month probation period.

The question I have is how destabilizing this would be to our Department of Defense, to the men and women in the military, and to the people the Secretary of Defense will be dealing with.

The second question I would have is whether we should have a person in the national command authority next to the President, in effect, on probation.

I also would ask the question whether anyone can assure that we are not going to have any kind of a crisis in the next 6 months. Are we going to be given assurance that there is no problem that is going to come up during that period of time? I do not think anyone can do that.

Finally, what will the standing of the Secretary of Defense and, indeed, the Department of Defense be in the international community during that period of time?

So there are a lot of things to consider, but these will be those that I will be focusing on overnight.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, this is the first occasion on which I have had the honor to rise and speak on the floor of this great lawmaking body, the U.S. Senate. I must say to you, Mr. President, that I had hoped that my first speech would be on a less difficult and less controversial issue, but that was not to be.

So I rise today, after much deliberation, to indicate that I have reached a decision on the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense. For me, this has been an extremely difficult and, yes, close call. I have spent many hours reviewing the report and the record of the Senate Armed Services Committee, reading the FBI files and Senator Tower's detailed responses in those files, and observing the Senate's deliberations to date. I have spoken with many of my colleagues, both Democrats and Republicans, as well as with President Bush and Senator Tower. I am deeply grateful for their availability, their thoughtfulness, and their counsel. I must say that I have also listened to my constituents in Connecticut who have offered me advice and letters and phone calls over these last several weeks.

In coming to this decision, Mr. President, I have also studied the historical role of the Senate in the confirmation process. The Constitution, as you know, establishes a clear role for the Senate but does not define the standards for us to apply in exercising that role. Nor has the Senate historically, on the occasions when it has exercised that role, applied a single, clear set of standards. Given the highly charged atmosphere surrounding Senator Tower's nomination and the fact that

I am at the very beginning of my time as a Member of this body, I want to articulate what this Senator, at least, sees as his role under the advice and consent power and the standards that I believe should apply in evaluating a Cabinet nominee.

REVIEW OF THE ADVICE AND CONSENT POWER

The history of the advice and consent power exercised by the Senate is complex. At the Constitutional Convention, Alexander Hamilton and James Wilson expounded the view that a strong and independent executive branch vested with the appointment power was critical to the effectiveness of the new government. Hamilton asserted that, "energy in the executive is the leading character in the definition of good government."

John Rutledge argued the opposing view, that placing the appointment power solely in the President would unduly concentrate power in the executive branch: "The people will think we are leaning too much toward Monarchy."

Luther Martin and Roger Sherman of my own State of Connecticut even argued for placing the appointment power solely in the Senate; no involvement by the President. But, as was often the case at the Constitutional Convention, the two perspectives on the appointment power were compromised in the final weeks. Article II, section 2 thus provides that while the power to "nominate" rests with the President, it is subject to the "Advice and Consent" of the Senate.

Hamilton, in the subsequent Federalist Papers, best summarized the meaning of the compromise. He thought it unlikely that the Senate would refuse to consent to Presidential appointments, except when there were "special and strong reasons for the refusal." He also noted that the confirmation power provided a "powerful" yet "silent" limit on Presidential power. He stated that it "would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President, and would tend greatly to prevent the appointment of unfit characters." He emphasized the benefit of this limited sharing of the appointment power between the legislative and executive branches: "The possibility of rejection would be [a] strong motive to care [by the President] in proposing."

Thus, the "Advice and Consent" power is part of the network of checks and balances that control the exercise of power in our system of government. I believe in a strong President, vested with authority and accountability, and clearly the President is entitled to the benefit of the doubt in his appointments. But the appointment power is in the end a shared power with the Senate. In the very apt words of another convention delegate, Governor Morris, "As the President was to nominate, there would be responsibility, and as the Senate is to concur, there would be security."

Consistent with the constitutional intent, the "Advice and Consent" power has been rarely exercised against Cabinet appointments. Fourteen Cabinet nominees failed to be confirmed between 1789 and 1988. Eight of these nominees were rejected on the Senate floor (six of these in the 19th century), four were withdrawn, and two were not voted out of committee. While actual rejections have been few, in the words of historian George Haynes, "in a sense the Senate's negative on appointments, like the President's veto on legislation, has often been most effective where not actually used: the consciousness of an imminent rejection or veto acts as an ever-present restraint."

THE PROPER STANDARDS FOR THE SENATE

Given this history, I believe that a number of considerations should govern the Senate's review of Cabinet nominations.

First, deference must be given to the President's selection of nominees for Cabinet positions. The standard is not whether an individual Senator would have selected someone else if he or she were the President, or whether in the Senate's collective judgment there is a better person for the job. No, rather, the proper question is whether the Senate can, consistent with its constitutional responsibility to provide advice and consent, find the President's choice acceptable.

Greater deference is due to Cabinet nominees than to any other Presidential appointments. These are the men and women the President selects to work directly with him on the most important issues of the day, and the President is held accountable for their conduct and performance. Judicial nominees, by contrast, are constitutionally buffered from the political processes, serving lifetime appointments that can be terminated only by impeachment.

However, as one distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, has stated, the President's prerogative to select his own Cabinet "does not mean * * * that the Senate's role in the confirmation process is automatically to approve each presidential nominee." In reviewing Cabinet nominations, the standard applied by the Senate should be based on Hamilton's concept of fitness for the position involved. To determine a nominee's fitness, I believe the Senate must consider the following: First, the knowledge, experience, and qualifications of the nominee for the position; second, the nominee's judgment, as evidenced by his conduct and decisions, as well as his personal behavior; and third, the nominee's ethics, including current or prior conflicts of interest. In unusual circumstances, the Senate might also cautiously consider fundamental and potentially irreconcilable policy differences with the nominee, although that situation is not presented in this case.

It is important to understand that these factors cannot constitute a rigid, clear-cut test that can be uniformly applied to nominees for every Cabinet position. In evaluating a nominee, the Senate must focus on the particular office he will assume and the kinds of problems that he is likely to face. So, in this case, for example, the Senate cannot tailor its standard of review to fit Senator Tower personally. It must tailor its review to focus on the specific responsibilities and problems that the Secretary of Defense will face during this administration.

Finally, we should remember that the test in reviewing Cabinet nominations is not whether the law has been violated by the nominee. If the Senate could only apply a test of whether the law has been violated, there would be effectively nothing left of the power to advise and consent. Nor must the Senate apply criminal evidentiary standards and procedures. We are not bound to prove or disprove criminal conduct.

We must in our best personal judgment determine whether the nominee is acceptable for the position for which he has been nominated. In doing that, of course, the Senate must apply a test of fundamental fairness. We must be fair not only to the President but to the nominee—by giving him an opportunity to present his case. I believe the Armed Services Committee has given Senator Tower that opportunity, as both Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER have previously stated. Senator Tower has been heard at length on the issues during the Committee hearings and since the close of the Committee's proceedings. He has availed himself of the opportunity to comment on each of the specific allegations in the FBI reports. He has also presented his case personally to several Members of the Senate.

EVALUATION OF SENATOR TOWER'S NOMINATION

According to these standards, and based on my review of all of the information available to the Senate, I have decided to vote against confirmation of John G. Tower for Secretary of Defense. As I noted at the outset, this has been an extremely difficult decision for me. I recognize that reasonable people reviewing the same information may disagree, but I am confident that I have reached the right personal conclusion.

The Secretary of Defense today has two great and overriding responsibilities and they relate to my evaluation of this nominee. One is to provide for the security of our Nation in a hostile world. The second is to manage the budget of America's most expensive agency of government.

In the final analysis, I have too many unresolved doubts about Senator Tower's fitness for the position of Secretary of Defense in both of these areas of overriding responsibility for that position. While I do not believe that the evidence concerning Senator Tower's drinking is sufficient to conclude that he is an alcohol-dependent person; nonetheless, the evidence does leave me with too many doubts about whether Senator Tower has the self-discipline and consistently sound judgment that we have a right to expect in our Secretary of Defense. The Secretary of Defense is number two in the chain of command of the United States military operations, including our nuclear arsenal. He may be called upon at a moment's notice, to make split-second decisions that affect our national security. History has shown that international incidents that may require a military response can occur without warning, at any time of the day or night. Tens of thousands of lives may hang in the balance on his judgment.

On the second point, in the management of this great department, in his farewell address, President Dwight D. Eisenhower warned that, "in the councils of Government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist."

I have tried to apply that warning by President Eisenhower, and the standard implicit in it, to my review of the facts in this case. I conclude that Senator Tower's passage through the revolving door from Senator and arms control negotiator to consultant to the defense industries leaves me with too much doubt about his judgment and his ability to be the detached and demanding Secretary of Defense we urgently need at this moment in our history. The Defense Department, as we all know, has an annual budget of $300 billion. As we struggle with our enormous national budget deficits, few things could be more important than the ability of the Defense Department to improve its efficiency and save millions of dollars in procurement costs. Because of wasteful spending and procurement scandals the people have lost confidence in the management of the Department of Defense. We simply cannot have a Secretary whose independence and judgment are subject to question.

I have tried to give the President and Senator Tower the benefit of the doubt, but in the end, there are simply too many doubts about this nominee for this critical position at this difficult moment in our history. And so with the greatest regret I conclude that, in order to satisfy my Constitutional obligation in the confirmation process, I must cast my vote against Senator John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. NUNN. addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. I note the Senator from Connecticut has studied this matter long and hard both in terms of the evidence in the case before us but even more fundamentally in terms of his scholarly approach to the whole question of what is the Senate's role on advise and consent.

I also recognize this is one of his first speeches on the floor of the Senate. Of course, I am pleased he came to the same conclusion that the committee came to, but I am even more impressed with the way he went about it because I know it has been a difficult decision for all. He made his decision based on both the evidence and a scholarly research of the Senate's historical role in advise and consent.

Mr. ROBB addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, I join with my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, in apologizing for the lateness of the hour and the difficulty that this particular situation brings. I, too, would like to address the question of the nomination of Senator Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, neither the Constitution nor any other document has established precedent that gives us a great deal of definitive guidance on standards on the exercise of our duties to advise and consent on executive department appointments.

Absent guidance from the Constitution or history, each Senator, obviously, must establish personal standards based on his or her own values, conscience and beliefs.

My conscience tells me that this body owes a nominee the duty of fairness. We owe that duty to nominees who enjoy broad support in this body, just as we owe it to nominees with whom we disagree.

I believe the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, my distinguished colleague and friend, the senior Senator from Virginia, and the distinguished majority leader, in concert with the Republican leader and many others, have done everything humanly possible to make this proceeding fair to Senator Tower.

Unfortunately, in spite of their efforts and the efforts of most of the Members of this body, matters which should have been kept private have reached the public domain, and this has resulted in what, in my judgment, has been fundamental unfairness to Senator Tower.

As someone with a special understanding of how rumor and untruth can take on a life of their own, I genuinely regret the pain that Senator Tower and his family have had to endure.

Mr. President, I hold dearly the conviction that a chief executive has a right to select his subordinates. We hold the President responsible for his advisers, and at the end of the day, history will judge the President at least in part on the basis of the caliber of his appointments.

But this body, as has been frequently mentioned, has a responsibility under the Constitution as well to advise and consent. The advice of the Senate has been unmistakable.

The President, cognizant of the Senate's advice, and presumably, hopefully in possession of all of the information that Senators have based their advice on and more, has persisted in the nomination.

While I have great respect for our President personally, and while I admire the President's steadfast loyalty to a friend, I regret that by stretching out this question, this nomination has taken on some partisan aspects which were clearly not present at the time the Armed Services Committee voted.

Because, Mr. President, when I am presented with a choice between a very substantial deference that I believe is owed to a President and a very firmly held conviction on the part of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I must cast my vote with my long time friend and now colleague, the chairman of that committee.

Mr. President, there are two aspects of the record that give me trouble with respect to this nomination of Senator Tower. There is ample evidence of the excessive use of alcohol, not dependency which I believe would be immediately disqualifying, but excessive use.

Senator Tower has pledged absolutely to refrain from alcohol consumption during his tenure, and it troubles me to have a man nominated for the office of Secretary of Defense feel compelled to take such a pledge.

Were it only for the question of alcohol, I would be inclined to decide with the President on this question because of the certainty and the verifiability of that pledge.

But in the area of his professional activities since leaving his post as chief negotiator for the START talks, I find matters which we question his nomination to lead the Pentagon at this crucial juncture in our history.

While there is nothing on the record indicating that Senator Tower did anything illegal or violated any code of ethics, I am concerned that his professional contacts, after leaving his post as chief negotiator for the START talks in Geneva, will continue to dog him if he is confirmed, and the necessity of frequent recusal, coupled with repeated questions of conflict of interest no matter what decision is made, would unnecessarily hamper a Secretary of Defense whose hands-on leadership at this particular time in our history is absolutely essential.

Mr. President, as has been noted frequently, this is not just any Cabinet position. The operational control of the Armed Forces of the Untied States, the ability to make decisions putting the lives of our men and women in uniform at stake, and in the case of nuclear weapons, conceivably the fate of the Earth is at stake, in my opinion, demand a higher standard.

Although I regret the ordeal that Senator Tower and his family have had to endure, for that matter the ordeal that this body has had to endure, and while I have been genuinely impressed by the eloquence and commitment of the Senators who have defended him, as well as those who have made the difficult choice to vote against confirmation, when I ask myself if John Tower is the right person at this particular point in our history to manage the Pentagon to restore public consensus for strong and effective defense, I regret that I cannot answer that question in the affirmative.

Mr. President, for the good of the country, it seems to me that the time has come to end this debate which has so distracted this body and much of the executive branch for too long. This nation has many pressing problems—the crisis with the savings and loans institution and the budget to name just two. I hope very much that tomorrow we will be able to conclude the chapter on this particular nomination and get on with the Nation's business. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. NUNN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, having discussed this matter with the Senator from Virginia, Senator ROBB, on several occasions, I can say without any doubt that I do not think anyone in this body has thought in more depth, not only about the Senate's advice and consent role, but about the evidence in question.

I know that he has had a great deal of struggle in his own mind as to what the right answer has been. I know that he has approached it with a great deal of diligence and with a conscientious effort to be fair to the nominee and to the President.

I also know that he was a strong chief executive of the State of Virginia, and being a strong chief executive he believes, as he said this evening, that the Chief Executive should be defered to in any cases of doubt in terms of the choice of his own people.

So I know how difficult this has been for the Senator from Virginia, and I must say because of my profound respect for him I not only understand the difficulty but it makes me also understand the importance of his decision in his own mind for his own reasons and in terms of his representation of his State.

I also want to say that I agree with him in his assessment of fairness. There have been stories out that should not have been out. In the process here, perhaps it has been unavoidable, but every time one has come out it has given me almost as much pain as it has, I am sure, the nominee—not quite but almost. I hope that we will be able to find better ways to handle this process in the future. The senior Senator from Virginia and I have struggled and struggled. We have asked ourselves over and over again what can we do to make it better, what can we do to make it fair, what can we do to prevent matters from coming out that should not. I think under the circumstances we have done our best, but that does not mean that we ought to be satisfied. It does not mean that we should not look back and determine whether we could have done things differently. It does not mean we cannot learn lessons from this one for the future. I hope we do not have another situation like this in the future. This one has been unique.

But let me close by saying the junior Senator from Virginia has struggled with this one. I know he has. From the point of view of my respect for him, I am gratified that he ended up agreeing with the position of the committee, not simply because his vote is important in this situation but because of the tremendous respect that I have for him and because I know how conscientiously he has approached this decision.

I thank the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I say to my good friend, indeed, it was a vote of conscience, and when a Senator makes a vote of conscience it is accepted. We shall continue our service to our State despite our differences on this most historic of votes in the Senate.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, there were two articles that appeared today in the Washington Post which I am in just a moment going to ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD. One is entitled "Placing a 'Check' On the President. Framers Believed the Senate Should Share Appointments." It discusses the advise and consent clauses as it appears in the Constitution on the basis of the work done by the delegates at the Constitutional Convention. I think it is very important in considering that power, particularly the placing of its function in the checks and balances, that the impact of that power on the nominating process is not reflected solely in the number of times in which a President's nominee has been turned down. The fact that the power exists, that the Senate will exercise this examination constitutes a very effective influence before the nomination is ever made. I think that needs to be recognized. Therefore, a reassertion of standards is important in that regard.

The other article is entitled "How Tower Used His 'No' Vote. Ex-Senator Never Shied Away From Scraps Over Nominees." It then discusses the fact that during his service in the Senate on occasion Senator Tower opposed nominees of the President of the United States including nominations to the Cabinet, and in fact in 1977 in opposing Ray Marshall to be Secretary of Labor, he took issue with that nomination on the basis of Marshall's closeness to the labor unions and undue influence by them over our policy. He said, and I quote him—this is Senator Tower then speaking—"I hope to have a Labor Secretary who can view those issues more objectively and not from the official union point of view: who could advise the President in a more objective way."

Mr. President, if you simply changed a few words in that statement, it would be equally applicable here today. You could change it to read, "I hope to have a Defense Secretary who can view those issues more objectively and not from the defense contractors' point of view: who could advise the President in a more objective way."

I think it is very important that the Members of the Senate have the benefit of these two articles, and I ask unanimous consent they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLACING A "CHECK" ON THE PRESIDENT: FRAMERS BELIEVED THE SENATE SHOULD SHARE APPOINTMENTS

(By Al Kamen)

It probably would not happen very often, Alexander Hamilton wrote 200 years ago, but it would happen every now and again that the Senate would reject a presidential nominee. That was not a bad thing, Hamilton said.

In fact, "it would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the president," Hamilton wrote in Federalist 76, "and would tend greatly to preventing the appointment of unfit characters. . . ."

Hamilton was not referring to the president's Cabinet because no idea of a Cabinet is in the Constitution. He was explaining the provision that gives the president the power to nominate officers of the government with the "advice and consent" of the Senate.

That provision in Article II of the Constitution, a compromise brokered 202 years ago, is at the heart of the controversy over former senator John G. Tower's embattled nomination to be secretary of defense.

Some of Tower's supporters have argued that the Senate has some sort of constitutional obligation to approve presidential nominees. But that view is based on tradition, rather than the Constitution or the debates involved in its ratification, according to experts.

Delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia believed strongly that certain powers should be shared by the Senate and the president, especially the appointment power. Throughout most of the convention, delegates held that the authority to appoint many high officials, including Supreme Court justices and ambassadors, should be retained exclusively by the Senate.

Late in the debates, those powers and the power to name "officers" was given to the president, but with the condition that they be subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. The delegates made no exception for Cabinet officers; neither did they establish up any criteria or offer any guidance for when a nominee should be rejected. Nothing in the original language would prevent the Senate from rejecting a nominee for any reason or no reason.

The notion of the Senate having appointment power may seem strange now, but many of the states apportioned authority that way at the time—the Virginia legislature still appoints judges—and the drafters drew on their experiences back home.

That "advice and consent" provision was not found in every draft of the Constitution and was not included in an earlier subcommittee report.

But after the language was later added, James Wilson, a delegate from Pennsylvania, tried on Sept. 7, 1787, to have the advice-and-consent clause removed, giving the president sole appointing authority across the board. Wilson said that the presidential responsibility for appointments would be "destroyed" by letting the Senate have a role.

But he was voted down. "As the president was to nominate, there would be responsibility," said Gouverneur Morris, "and as the Senate is to concur, there would be security." Morris also from Pennsylvania, meant that the Senate would act as a check to ensure nominees were qualified.

The contours of the Tower battle are determined by politics, not by the Constitution, experts on both sides agree.

"Whenever I see a member of the Senate solemnly intone that there is a serious constitutional question involved here I have to laugh," said Duke Law School Prof. Walter Dellinger, a former adviser to Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee. "There is not a serious constitutional question that they may reject the president's choice. This is a question of prudence and policy."

Dellinger said that, as a policy matter, the Senate may consider both political philosophy and fitness when it reviews judicial nominees, but that, "as a practical matter, the president should have the final choice as to the political philosophy of his [Cabinet] appointees."

Gary McDowell, vice president of the conservative National Legal Center for the Public Interest, agreed that "a senator has a right to consider anything he wants" in assessing a nominee. "It is not inappropriate for the Senate to consider personal traits," he said.

Still, Hamilton was right in his prediction that it was not very probable that [a president's] nomination would often be overruled", the Senate has rejected only eight Cabinet nominees and only about a dozen Supreme Court nominees.

HOW TOWER USED HIS "NO" VOTE: EX-SENATOR NEVER SHIED AWAY FROM SCRAPS OVER NOMINEES

(By Dan Balz)

"The suggestion has been made that the people should trust the president to make the right appointment," the senator said during floor debate over a controversial national security nomination early in a new president's first term. "I think that ordinarily we do around here. But after all, the Constitution has vested in us the responsibility for advice and consent, and it is one that we should exercise."

The man who spoke those words, then-Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) never shied away from exercising that responsibility—or from questioning the wisdom of president's appointments. He got into a number of scraps over Cabinet and sub-Cabinet nominations during his 24 years in the Senate—although none was as bitter as his own nomination to be Secretary of Defense has become.

Tower made his comments about the Senate's role 12 years ago during debate over President Jimmy Carter's nomination of Paul C. Warnke to become head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and chief SALT negotiator.

Tower opposed that nomination unsuccessfully—as he had done in several other cases. In January 1977, he opposed Carter's nomination of fellow-Texan Ray Marshall to be secretary of labor. During the Ford administration, he opposed the nomination of William J. Usery to be secretary of labor. And in 1963, he opposed the nomination of Paul H. Nitze to be secretary of the Navy.

Two factors generally guided Tower in his decision to oppose these various nominations: his belief that the Senate should use its own judgment—and ideology.

In Warnke's case, Tower thought the nominee was too liberal. He accused Warnke of "grievous errors in judgment" on U.S. weapons systems, and he said he feared Warnke would be even more mistaken in his judgments about Soviet weapon systems as a negotiator.

His opposition to Nitze in November 1963 was for similar reasons. Nitze was nominated by President John F. Kennedy and immediately ran into opposition on the Senate Armed Services Committee for views expressed in a 1960 California speech and the product of a 1958 conference in Cleveland. The battle is described by author Strobe Talbott in his book on Nitze, "The Master of the Game."

In the California speech, Nitze had suggested that the Strategic Air Command be put under the control of NATO and that the United Nations be given control over the use of nuclear weapons. Nitze attempted to explain his views to the committee, but was clearly on the defensive.

After Kennedy's assassination, President Lyndon B. Johnson pressed committee Chairman Richard Russell (D-Ga.) to bring the nomination to a vote. Tower was one of a handful of senators (including Republican Sen. Milward Simpson of Wyoming, the father of Senate Republican Whip Alan Simpson of Wyoming) who opposed Nitze.

Involving his own service in the Navy, Tower said he opposed Nitze "because of his views on disarmament, his views on our military posture and his views on the disposition of the military forces."

Tower and Nitze eventually ended up on the same team, as part of President Ronald Reagan's arms control negotiation team in 1985-86.

Tower's longtime fight with organized labor led him to oppose Marshall in 1977 and Usery the year before. In Marshall's case, he spoke at length on the Senate floor about labor's influence in public policy and his fear that Marshall would simply be a rubberstamp for its views.

"I hope to have a labor secretary who can view those issues more objectively and not from the official union point of view: who could advise the president in a more objective way," he said.

For a man now accused by some of his critics of being too close to the defense industry, that opposition to Marshall has a ring of irony—

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:01 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Hays, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following joint resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.J. Res. 148. Joint resolution designating the month of March in both 1989 and 1990 as "Women's History Month."

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, I report favorably a nomination list in the Public Health Service which was printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 3, 1989, and ask unanimous consent, to save the expense of reprinting on the Executive Calendar, that these nominations lie at the Secretary's desk for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 531. A bill to temporarily suspend the duty on mesalamine; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. SHELBY, and Mr. HEFLIN):

S. 532. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide that any concurrent resolution on the budget that contains reconciliation directives shall include a directive with respect to the statutory limit on the public debt, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, with instructions that if one committee reports the other committee has 30 days of continuous session to report or be discharged.

By Mr. REID:

S. 533. A bill to protect the rights of victims of crime and to establish a Federal victim's bill of rights for children; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 534. A bill to provide criminal penalties for the mailing of unsolicited sexually oriented advertisements, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 535. A bill to increase civil monetary penalties based on the effect of inflation; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. GARN (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 536. A bill to settle issues relating to Ute Indian water rights and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, jointly, by unanimous consent.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. SIMON):

S. 537. A bill to require that any calculation of the Federal deficit made as a part of the Federal budget process include a calculation of the Federal deficit minus the Social Security reserves; to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, with instructions that if one committee reports, the other committee has 30 days of continuous session to report or be discharged.

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 538. A bill to provide that certain provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 providing special rules for financially troubled financial institutions shall not remain in effect after the enactment of financial institution reform legislation; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. INOUYE, and Mr. STEVENS):

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. DIXON, Mr. WARNER, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. HATCH, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. PELL, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S.J. Res. 73. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning October 29, 1989, as "Gaucher's Disease Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GORE:

S.J. Res. 74. Joint resolution to designate the month of May 1989 as "National Digestive Disease Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. ROTH:

S. Con. Res. 18. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that Federal laws regarding the taxation of State and local government bonds should not be changed in order to increase Federal revenues; to the Committee on Finance.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. SHELBY, and Mr. HEFLIN):

S. 532. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide that any concurrent resolution on the budget that contains reconciliation directives shall include a directive with respect to the statutory limit on the public debt, and for other purposes; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DEBT CEILING REFORM ACT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Debt Ceiling Reform Act of 1989.

Although I have come to this floor many times to introduce and support legislation to restore fiscal responsibility to the Federal Government, I have been one of the leading skeptics of the Gramm-Rudman law.

In my opinion, there were two fatal flaws in the current budget process. First, the Gramm-Rudman law devised a formula for deficit reduction which is so filled with exemptions and special rules that well over half of the Federal budget is exempt from formula reduction.

The second and most serious flaw and false promise of the budget process as amended by the Gramm-Rudman law is the total reliance on arbitrary economic projections as benchmarks of progress toward the much promised balanced budget of 1993. Under the current budget process and Gramm-Rudman plan, economic forecasts are made for a period into the future, and all attention is focused on making the forecasts meet the deficit target for a single fiscal year.

In such a legislative environment, no holds are barred to make the future target year look as good as possible regardless of the long-term effects of the chosen action. This invites manipulations and procrastination.

My skepticism was again confirmed when President Reagan's 1990 budget proposal revealed that the deficit for 1989 will likely exceed $161 billion, $25 billion above the level mandated by the Gramm-Rudman law.

This revelation came only a couple of months after the President's Office of Management and Budget certified the deficit to be within the Gramm-Rudman targets in the current system, there is no continuous enforcement mechanism to assure that economic estimates are correct or that deficit reduction efforts are sufficient.

In essence, the Gramm-Rudman law does not work to reduce deficits, it works to reduce deficit projections. It should be recognized that there is a difference. The more difficult the target is to meet, the more creative the political branches of Government will be in their search to painlessly reduce the deficit.

The problem is that the Gramm-Rudman process ignores the total debt of the United States. The temporary shifting or spending for a day or so, from one fiscal year into another as the Congress and President have done in the past, may appear to reduce the deficit in a given year, but it has no beneficial effect on total Government spending or the accumulated national debt.

If the Congress and the President are serious about reducing the deficit, we had better focus our attention on both the desired declining annual deficits and on the accumulated national debt.

The debt ceiling reform I introduce today would essentially cap the statutory debt ceiling to match the deficit targets of the congressional budget resolution.

Under recent practice, the House of Representatives has passed its initial debt ceiling legislation under a rule which ties the debt ceiling to the passage of the annual congressional budget, thereby avoiding at least one record vote on a "stand alone" debt ceiling bill. The Senate, of course, more often than not, has engaged in the high debt ceiling politics. The debt ceiling is often a legislative lightning rod.

Historians should note that the search for votes to push the statutory debt ceiling above the landmark $2 trillion level in 1986 was the driving force behind the creation of the Gramm-Rudman law. One can only imagine what new gimmick will be created to push in the debt ceiling over the $3 trillion mark.

Mr. President, prior to the adjournment of the 99th Congress, the Senate broke with tradition and the debt ceiling was incorporated into the annual budget reconciliation bill. The reconciliation bill is the deficit reduction legislation which enforces the terms of the congressional budget resolution. I believe that it made a great deal of sense to link the debt ceiling to the reconciliation process.

If Congress is to approve an increase in the statutory debt ceiling, it should also be required to approve deficit reduction measures to assure that the Congress, at a minimum, keeps its deficit reduction commitments.

The legislation which I introduce today would put debt ceiling legislation into the budget cycle; require that the borrowing aspect of the budget be subject to reconciliation instructions; and require that annual legislation to increase the debt ceiling be included in the annual reconciliation package. The debt ceiling would then be subject to the limited debate rules of reconciliation and prevent the debt ceiling from becoming a magnet for all types of amendments.

In addition, under my proposal a three-fifths vote would be necessary to increase the debt ceiling to beyond the level contemplated by the congressional budget resolution.

Such a procedure would institute continuous enforcement of the deficit targets contained in each year's budget. If Congress sticks to its annual budget and corrects it for changing economic conditions, debt ceiling legislation would be handled in a routine manner under the limited debate procedures of reconciliation.

If the Federal Government borrows funds at a rate faster than contemplated by the annual budget, the Congress would need a three-fifths vote to increase the debt ceiling. Other measures to deal with a budget shortfall, such as reducing spending and/or raising revenue would only require a simple majority. No longer would increasing the national debt be the easiest way for Congress to satisfy its spending appetite.

This procedure would also make it much more difficult for the Congress or the President to employ smoke and mirrors instead of serious deficit reduction. Commitment to deficit reduction would be measured by the national debt in addition to the arbitrary Gramm-Rudman snapshot of the projected deficit for the coming fiscal year. Accounting gimmicks would be discouraged because the accumulated national debt would grow when spending is shifted rather than reduced.

What I propose here is a very tough but workable solution to the faulty budget enforcement mechanism.

Under the legislation I introduce today, the debt ceiling could only be raised beyond the level contemplated by the congressional budget with a three-fifths vote, the same margin required to waive certain Gramm-Rudman points of order. However, only a simple majority is necessary to alter spending and revenue policies to keep the budget on track.

If the Congress and the President could not come to an agreement, the Government would be on a short tether in that Federal spending authority would begin to wind down. If borrowing authority is not extended, we could spend only incoming revenues.

This procedure would require continuous congressional attention to the actual levels of spending rather than annual projected levels.

The reform I propose today, would force Congress and the President to be careful and honest. In addition, it proposed a built-in safety valve for any unforeseen future problems by providing a waiver by a three-fifths vote.

Mr. President, our runaway spending habits will cripple our Nation. We can no longer pass along our bills to our children and grandchildren. Our generation must be willing to pay its way. We need truth, not sleight of hand in the Federal budget.

Mr. President, the Congress must face the fiscal facts and work to reduce deficit spending rather than hide it. I invite my colleagues to support this important budget reform initiative, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 532

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. RECONCILIATION DIRECTIVES TO INCLUDE DIRECTIVE WITH RESPECT TO INCREASE IN STATUTORY LIMIT ON THE PUBLIC DEBT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 641) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) RECONCILIATION DIRECTIVES WITH RESPECT TO PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT.—

"(1) Any concurrent resolution on the budget for a fiscal year that contains directives of the type described in paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (a) for such fiscal year shall also include a directive of the type described in paragraph (3) of such subsection for such fiscal year.

"(2) Any change in the statutory limit on the public debt that is recommended pursuant to a directive of the type described in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) shall be included in the reconciliation legislation reported pursuant to subsection (b) for such fiscal year.".

(b) CONFORMING CHANGE.—Section 310(d)(2) of such Act is amended by inserting "(other than a provision reported pursuant to a directive of the type described in subsection (a)(3))" after "motion to strike a provision".

SEC. 2. POINT OF ORDER.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding the Standing Rules of the Senate, except as provided in subsection (b), it shall not be in order in the Senate to consider any bill or joint resolution (or any amendment thereto or conference report thereon) that increases the statutory limit on the public debt during a fiscal year above the level set forth as appropriate for such fiscal year in the concurrent resolution on the budget for such fiscal year agreed to under section 301 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

(b) EXCEPTION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to any reconciliation bill or reconciliation resolution reported pursuant to section 310(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 during any fiscal year (or any conference report thereon) that contains a provision that—

(1) increases the statutory limit on the public debt pursuant to a directive of the type described in section 310(a)(3) of such Act, and

(2) becomes effective on or after the first day of the following fiscal year.

(c) WAIVERS.—Subsection (a) may be waived or suspended in the Senate by a vote of three-fifths of the Members, duly chosen and sworn.

(d) APPEALS.—If the ruling of the presiding officer sustains a point of order raised pursuant to paragraph (1), a vote of three-fifths of the Members duly chosen and sworn shall be required to sustain an appeal of such ruling. Debate on any such appeal shall be limited to two hours, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees. An appeal of any such point of order is not subject to a motion to table.

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 4. EXERCISE OF RULEMAKING POWERS.

This Act and the amendments made by this Act are enacted by the Congress—

(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply, and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to such House) at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

By Mr. REID:

S. 533. A bill to protect the rights of victims of crime and to establish a Federal victim's bill of rights for children; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL VICTIM'S SERVICES AND PROTECTIONS COMPLIANCE ACT

Mr. REID. Mr. President, as adults, we are entrusted by children to help them grow and flourish, to protect their innocence, and to keep them from harm. After all, the children today are our hope for the future. I have some serious reservations as to how well we are cultivating that hope. As one parent says, "Children are our future, but we are their salvation."

Today I am introducing legislation to protect victims of crime and to establish a child victims' bill of rights.

The need to respond to our Nation's children has never been stronger. Nightly newscasts are filled with stories of children seized from drug-infested homes and negligent parents. Cases like that of 6-year-old Lisa Steinberg and her baby brother exposed us to atrocities committed against children that are nearly incomprehensible.

A new concept of "high risk children" has been introduced into our daily vocabulary. Frankly, I am not proud about this addition to our dictionary.

My bill responds to a conclusion reached by the 1987 President's Child Safety Partnership. Their report states, "Crimes against children are rarely treated as crimes against adults. The age of the victim should not lessen society's response to crime. Unfortunately, and incomprehensibly, it does."

The child victims' bill of rights requires certain professionals to identify children who they suspect are victims of abuse or neglect. Sometimes we need to listen to children with our eyes. Otherwise, there is too much that goes unsaid. An estimated 2.2 million cases of child abuse and neglect were reported in 1986—how many more went unreported?

Nevada's Governor, Bob Miller, has helped draw attention to child victims' rights. As district attorney of Clark County 10 years ago, he formed the Citizens Committee on Victim Rights.

In 1982, Bob Miller was appointed to the Presidential Task Force on Victims of Crime. This task force found that, when we do listen to children—when we do encourage them to talk about what happened—it is in the context of a courtroom, a large, foreboding room with rows of faceless spectators and attorneys who question and cajole with rhetoric well beyond the vocabularly comprehension of a child. Consider the example of the 8-year-old girl who had to testify after being raped. The courtroom audience laughed when the young girl didn't understand the attorney's questions about the male attacker's anatomy. My bill contains numerous provisions designed to make the courtroom experience much less traumatic for children.

The legislation also calls for allowing children to testify outside the courtroom and by way of recorded deposition. The child's identity will be kept confidential, and the number of interviews to which the child is subject will be kept to a minimum. I will explain, in greater detail, the need for these provisions and others contained in my legislation in the days and weeks ahead. Congress must follow the State governments' lead in listening to our children. At least 12 States have enacted a child victims' bill of rights. Up to 41 States have enacted some type of child-related legislation.

The pressing importance of this issue must be recognized at the Federal level. We need to assume a greater role in developing our children—our hope for the future. By all accounts, sexually abused children have an above-normal incidence of becoming abusers themselves. Neglected children fall by the wayside into the netherworld of drugs, unemployment, and violence. We must help these child victims before they are scarred for life.

I recently spoke to students at a vocational education school in Nevada. These kids who pursue occupations rather than go to college are referred to time and again as the "forgotten half" of young people in this country. Victims of crime are often referred to as the "forgotten people" of our justice system.

What has happened to our memory? How many more will we categorize under the label of "forgotten"? I will continue presenting my colleagues with the necessity for a child victims' bill of rights, and additional protections for all victims of crime. Without action, our hope for the future will steadily, inevitably, wither to despair.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 534. A bill to provide criminal penalties for the mailing of unsolicited sexually oriented advertisements, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENALTIES FOR MAILING OF UNSOLICITED SEXUALLY ORIENTED ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which will protect Americans from the continued invasion of sexually oriented advertisements. I recently received a letter from a constituent informing me of the fact that he had been mailed unsolicited sexually explicit advertisements. After researching this matter, I found that mailing of unsolicited, graphic sexually oriented advertising is occurring on a daily basis throughout this country. What is even more disgusting is that much of this material is addressed to young children. In addition, parents with young, impressionable children are being forced to confront and discuss sensitive, private subjects such as sex, pornography, and obscenity with their young children well before they deem it appropriate. The fact that children and adults go to their mail boxes and have such unsolicited material forced upon them is simply not acceptable.

Under current law, anyone who does not want to receive such material can request that the Post Office add his or her name to a list which would prohibit mailing such advertisements to them. The addressee must go to the Post Office and fill out a form in order to be put on the list. Those who mail sexually oriented advertisements would only then be subject to criminal prosecution.

Regarding the current procedures, they simply do not work. The postal service is having serious trouble keeping up with the thousands of people requesting that their names and addresses be put on this list. Not only is this an unreasonable burden on the Post Office, it is an unreasonable burden on the citizens. Why should the burden be on every American to request that he or she be taken off these pornography merchants mailing lists? According to U.S. Postal Service officials, there are currently over 465,000 people on this list and over 130,000 of them are children. In addition, despite the efforts of an addressee to have himself put on the list, he or she may still receive such material for 30 days after the form has been filed with the Post Office. Furthermore, these "smut pushers" often change single letters in the spelling of names or simply address the material to "resident" to avoid prosecution.
